Note.—Knowing the afflicted and persecuted condition, in which his brethren were; the apostle exhorted them to “count it” altogether a cause of rejoicing, when they “fell into divers temptations.” Conscious of their weakness, they were in general warned not to run into temptation, and taught to pray not to be “led into temptation.” (Notes, Matt. 6:13. 26:40, 41.) Yet if the Lord saw good, that, notwithstanding their watchfulness, they should fall into such “trials,” as might expose them to temptation, and give them an opportunity of resisting and overcoming it; they ought to consider it as a matter of unmingled joy, an occasion of evidencing the sincerity and strength of their love to God, and as a rich advantage to their souls, though painful for the time. (Notes, Matt. 5:10—12. Luke 6:21—23. 1 Pet. 1:6,7. 4:12—16.) For they might know, from the word of God and their own experience, that the “trial of their faith,” by which its genuine nature and strength were proved, had a tendency, in the event, to “work patience” in their temper and conduct; and to bring them into a resigned, dependent, waiting frame of mind, connected with meekness and perseverance in well doing. But, in order to derive the full benefit from their trials, they must allow “patience to have its perfect work;” and submissively wait, in reliance on the promises of God, and obedience to his commandments, till he saw good to deliver them; without being induced, by the number, variety, or duration of their sufferings, to use sinful means of deliverance, or grow “faint” and “weary in well doing;” or to manifest peevishness, discontent, or despondency. (Notes, 11:5,7—11. Heb. 6:13—15. 10:35—39. 11:27.) Thus “patience,” like a salutary medicine, would “have its perfect operation,” and bring them into so tractable, docile, meek, compassionate, and resigned a state of mind; so endear to them the love and sufferings of Christ; so wean them from the world, and so reconcile them to death; that they would be rendered complete and mature in every part of the Christian character; and in all respects meet and prepared for the duties of their several situations, and “wanting nothing” in order to the performance of every good work. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. Heb. 12:4—13.)

is the same as that in the Lord’s prayer, which is rendered “temptation.” Indeed every trial is, or gives occasion to, temptation; and every temptation is a trial of our hearts, and tends to show whether divine grace or corrupt nature has, at that time, the ascendancy. (Notes, 12—15. Gen. 22:1.) The apostle, however, no doubt especially referred to the persecutions, for the sake of their Lord, to which Christians were then peculiarly exposed.—The trying. (3) Το δοκιμίων. 1 Pet. 1:7. ‘The act of proving, or assaying.’ Δοκιμῆς. Rom. 5:4. 2 Cor. 2:9. 8:2. 13:3. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—In attempting properly to endure and improve their trials, as well as in a great variety of other matters, many, to whom the apostle wrote, would experience and discover, that they were very deficient in wisdom. When, therefore, any were conscious, that they were not capable of distinguishing truth from error, or of ascertaining the line of conduct which they ought to pursue; they should immediately bring the case before God, and earnestly beseech him to be their Teacher and Counsellor, by the influences of his Spirit enabling them to understand, remember, and apply the instructions of his holy word; and to remove all prejudices and carnal passions, which tended to mislead them. This any person might do with confidence; seeing the Lord was ever ready to “give liberally” to all who asked him, of whatever description they were; nor did he ever upbraid such humble petitioners for wisdom with the folly and sinfulness of their former conduct, or with any of their mistakes, and want of teachableness. So that assuredly wisdom would be given to every one, who thus sought for it, in proportion to his wants, difficulties, and duties. (Notes, 1 Kings 3:5—14. Prov. 2:1—7. 3:5,6.) But, in order to obtain the blessing, they must “ask in faith, nothing wavering;” they must not allow themselves to question whether this were the proper way of seeking wisdom, or doubt of the faithfulness of God to his promises; but confidently rely on him to direct them in the right way. For "he that wavered," or hesitated in his judgment in these respects, and was disposed to listen to carnal counsellors, or to halt between God and the world, would be always fluctuating and variable; being tossed from one thing to another, by every change of circumstances, or every gale of doctrine, as the wave of the sea is driven about by the wind. (Notes, Matt. 21:21,22. Mark 11:22-26. Rom. 4:15-22. Eph. 4:14-16. Jude 11-13.) Such wavering professors of the gospel, therefore, who were religious only by starts, and had no abiding, realizing belief of the truth, or dependence on the promises of God, could have no good reason to expect, that they should receive any thing from him: as they would scarcely have presented their prayers, under some sudden pang of devotion, but they would turn to other counsels and projects. Indeed, "double-minded men are unstable in all their ways," nor can any dependence be placed on them; whilst they are aiming to unite contrary interests, and are unsettled in their principles for want of faith in the word of God. (Notes, Gen. 49:3,4. Josh. 24:15. 1 Kings 18:21. Matt. 6:22-24.)—"Let him come to God with firm adherence 'on him; a mind resolved, whatsoever comes, 'to stick fast to God; to use no means of delivering himself, but such as are acceptable to 'him; never entertaining a doubt, whether 'God's ways or his own are to be adhered to, 'for the obtaining of his ends; making no 'question of God's power and will to answer 'his requests; and therefore praying, and depending on him quietly for an issue out of all. 'Whereas, ... doubting or wavering keeps men 'in a perpetual tempest and agitation of mind, 'always tossed from one ... dependence to another.' Hammond.—"A double-minded man," 'whose schemes are divided between God and 'the world, and who cannot cheerfully and resolutely commit himself, in confidence of divine support, to be led whithersoever Providence 'shall please, "is unsettled in all his ways." He will perpetually be running into inconsistencies of conduct: and those imperfect and undetermined impressions of religion, which he feels, will serve rather to perplex and torment, than guide and secure him.' Doddridge.—The divided dependence, at some times apparently on God, and at others evidently on a man's own wisdom, resolution, or righteousness, seems also applied; as well as the divided aim and purpose. Such characters differ widely from weak believers; who constantly expect and seek help from God, and do not allow any doubts of his veracity and faithfulness; though they are harassed with fears, lest there be something in their case, or manner of asking, which should exclude them from the benefit. Their language is, "Lord, to whom shall I go? Thou hast the words of eternal life?"

10 But the rich, <sup>y</sup> in that he is made low; <sup>z</sup> because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away.

11 For the sun is no sooner <sup>a</sup> risen with a burning heat, but it withereth the grass, and the flower thereof falleth, and the grace of the fashion of it perisheth: <sup>b</sup> so also shall the rich man fade away in his ways.

Note.—In order to attain greater simplicity and stability in the faith, it was proper for believers to know in what they ought to "rejoice," or glory. "The brother of low degree," the real Christian, who was poor and afflicted in his outward circumstances, should not deem himself unhappy on that account: on the contrary he ought to rejoice or glory, 'to comfort 'himself and lift up his heart;' Beza; because he was exalted, in an honorable relation to Christ, in being conformed to him as to his outward condition, and in being made as one of "the sons of God, and heirs" of heaven. (Notes, 2:5-7. Luke 6:20. Rom. 12:14-16. 2 Cor. 6:3-10. 8:1-9. 1 Tim. 6:6-10.) But the affluent Christian ought not to rejoice or glory in his riches, or at all trust in them for happiness: (Notes, Jer. 9:23,24. 1 Tim. 6:17-19.) rather let him rejoice, in that "he is made low" in the disposition of his heart; having been convinced of his guilt, depravity, and misery, and made humbly willing as an indigent pensioner on the mercy of God, to ask for the blessings of salvation, in the same way with the poorest of his brethren; and to consider himself as no wiser or better than they, but merely intrusted with a larger stewardship, of which a proportionable account must shortly be rendered. (Notes, Luke 16:1-13.) Being thus "made low" would be a solid ground for exaltation; seeing that few rich persons were thus humbled and made "poor in spirit;" nor would the cause for this joy be abated, even if they were made low in circumstances also, through the rapacity of their persecutors. For all outward splendor and distinction must soon pass away, as the gaudy flowers, which grow among the grass, are withered by the scorching sun, and lose all their beauty and transient glory, even sooner than the green blade does; and being withered they perish, and are less valuable than the common herbage. (Marg. Ref. z—b) Thus rich men flourish only to be cut down, they grow but to wither, and their transient distinctions terminate in deeper misery and disgrace, if they proceed "in their ways" of avarice, luxury, pride, selfishness, or ungodliness; and are not made low, by repentance, faith, self-denial, crucifixion to the world, and submission to the righteousness and authority of God. (Notes, Matt. 19:23—26. Luke 1:46—55. 6:24—26. 12:15—21. 16:19—26. 1 Pet. 1:23—25.) This is an obvious and apposite interpretation. But to render the passage, (by inserting a word needlessly,) "Let the rich be ashamed, in that he is brought low;" as some learned men do, wholly destroys the energy and beauty of the contrast: and to explain it exclusively of the rich man, when reduced to poverty for the sake of the gospel; would imply, that no rich man, however humble, poor in spirit, liberal, and condescending to his poor brethren, could have any ground of rejoicing, or glorying in Christ, and in the hope of glory; unless he voluntarily relinquished, or were forcibly deprived of, his estate and possessions, and so reduced to entire poverty! A doctrine well suited to some orders of papists, but not at all to genuine Christianity. It is proper that some persons should be the Lord's stewards and almoners, in outward things: and if they be made low, as humble, teachable, penitent believers in Christ, and thankful to be thus employed by him; let them rejoice in this humiliation of heart, under these circumstances, which almost always increase pride and self-exaltation. Note.—While the world deemed those happy who enjoyed uninterrupted prosperity, though it served to increase their pride, avarice, sensuality, and impiety; those were indeed to be congratulated, as "blessed, who endured temptation," and passed through various afflictive and trying dispensations, with submissive constancy, and the persevering obedience of faith and hope. For after the Christian had been thus proved, and the reality of his grace manifested; and after his holy affections had been thus invigorated, and the temper of his mind improved; he would be honored, as a conqueror in the spiritual contest: not with a wreath of fading flowers, but with "the crown of life;"

the "honor, glory, and immortality," which the Lord had promised to them that love him, as reconciled to him and made to delight in him and his ways, by faith in Christ Jesus. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, 2:5—7. 5:9—11. Rom. 8:28—31. Heb. 12:2—11. 1 Pet. 5:1—4. Rev. 2:10,11.)

13 Let <sup>g</sup> no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with <sup>h</sup> evil, neither tempteth he any man:

14 But every man is tempted, <sup>i</sup> when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed.

15 Then, <sup>j</sup> when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and <sup>k</sup> sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death.

Note.—When trials become "temptations," and occasions of sin, no man should venture to say, that he is "tempted by God;" as if he were the Author of transgressions, or of the dishonorable event of the trial. (Notes, 2—4. Gen. 22:1.)—The commandments and providential dispensations of God make trial of men's hearts, and tend to discover what dispositions prevail in them. Where gracious affections are prevalent, through the power of the Holy Spirit, remarkable obedience and fidelity are the consequence of the trial; but when sin and Satan rule within, disobedience must be the effect. (Notes, Deut. 8:2,3,16. 13:1—5. 2 Sam. 24:1,2. 1 Chr. 21:1. 2 Chr. 32:30—33. Prov. 17:3.) Nothing, therefore, which is sinful, in the heart or conduct, can be ascribed to God, without the same absurdity as it would be, to charge darkness and coldness on the sun. (Note, Ex. 4:21.) "For God cannot be tempted with evil;" his absolute perfection and all-sufficiency render it impossible that there should ever be any inducement for him, in the most minute degree, to deviate from complete and entire justice, truth, wisdom, purity, and goodness: neither "doth he," in this sense, "tempt any man," by putting evil into his heart, suggesting it to his thoughts, or necessitating the commission of it. He is not the Author of the dross, though his fiery trial detects and exposes it. But "every man is tempted" to commit sin, when the inordinate desires of his heart after worldly ease, exemption from persecution, honor, wealth, or pleasure, induce him to seize the bait, with which Satan entices him: thus he is drawn out of the line of duty; as the fish is dragged out of the water, when it has been enticed by the delusive morsel, which covered the hook. after any object which cannot be obtained without sin, "is conceived" in the heart, through the suggestions of Satan, and the allurements of external objects; the purpose of indulgence is admitted and cherished. Thus actual transgression is brought forth; and when this is completed, "it bringeth forth death," as its genuine offspring: and nothing but the mercy and grace of God, through Christ Jesus, can prevent the sinner's final destruction. This may be considered as the scriptural account of the original of moral evil, the natural history of the conception, production, progeny, and consequence of the first sin, and of every sin; except as repentance, through God's mercy in Christ Jesus, prevents the effects of them. (Notes, Gen. 3:1—6. Josh. 7: 20—26. 2 Sam. 11:1—5.)—But perhaps the apostle referred to the case of apostates, who, under persecutions, through love of the world, conceived the purpose of renouncing Christianity; which, being deliberately done and persisted in, ended in their final obduracy and destruction.—It is egregious and pernicious trifling, and manifestly absurd, to take occasion from the English word "lust," which is often used to mean one particular sensual inclination, when impetuous and ungoverned, to limit the passage merely to sensuality; as if the impetuous and ungoverned desire of power, praise, wealth, or revenge, were not "lusting," as much as the sensual inclinations. The original word indeed is often used in a good sense; (Luke 22: 15. Phil. 1:23,) and simply means a vehement inclination, whatever be the object. (Note, Rom. 7:7,8.)

18 Of <sup>q</sup> his own will begat he us <sup>r</sup> with the word of truth, that we should be <sup>s</sup> a kind of first-fruits of his creatures.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—It behaved all concerned, to be very careful not to mistake in this most important matter; lest they should be induced to listen to temptation, and deviate from their duty, from an erroneous supposition that circumstances would excuse their sins; or lest they should dishonor and offend God, by ascribing that misconduct to him, which was solely the effect of their own apostate nature, and external circumstances. Every thing good, of whatever kind, must be considered as a gift and bounty coming down from God: being beneficial in itself and perfect in its kind; like its great Author, who is "the Father," the Source, and the Fountain "of light," natural, moral, and spiritual; the Author of whatever is beautiful, excellent, and good, in all creatures and in the whole universe; as well as of all true knowledge, wisdom, holiness, and felicity, in those rational agents who never sinned, and in redeemed sinners. (Marg. Ref. o.—Notes, John 1:4—9.) But nothing of a contrary nature comes down from him, "with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." The sun, the great natural light, which he has made, appears to us, to have several changes and turnings, whence summer and winter, day and night, succeed each other, but in fact these appearances arise entirely from our varied situation respecting it. Thus God is immutably the Fountain of good, and of nothing else; all good is to be ascribed to him and sought from him: but the evil, which we do or suffer, with all the changes which we experience, are from ourselves; the consequences of our having turned away from God, and of a change in our situation respecting him; and must not in any degree be ascribed to Him, who is unchangeably the same in his nature and perfection without the least variation. Indeed his conduct proceeds upon the same unalterable principles of justice, truth, wisdom, and goodness; whatever effect it may produce on us, according to our character, behavior, or state in his sight: and all sin, error, ignorance, and misery must be ascribed to the mutability, frailty, and imperfections of created beings.—It should also be remembered, that all to whom the apostle wrote, as well as others, had been in themselves "dead in sin" and "children of wrath;" and that God, "of his own will," had regenerated them by his Spirit, "through the word of truth." (Notes, John 3:1—8. Eph. 2: 1—10. Tit. 3:4—7. 1 Pet. 1:23—25. 1 John 3:7—10.) This he had most graciously done, in order that they might be consecrated to his service, as "a kind of first-fruits of his creatures," more excellent and valuable than the rest of them; and as an earnest of a vastly larger increase from the Gentile world, in that and future ages; even as the first-fruits, presented to the Lord, were the earnest of the future harvest, and brought a blessing upon it. (Notes, Lev. 23:5—14. Jer. 2:2,3.)

Note.—As believers owed all the difference, in their state and character, to the sovereign will and distinguishing grace of God, by means of “the word of truth;” (Note, 17—19.) it behoved all of them to be “swift” and prompt “to hear” further admonitions, instructions, and counsels, from the same source, in a teachable and attentive manner. They ought likewise to “be slow to speak;” not being rash, or dogmatical, in their judgment and decisions, not hasty to assume the office of teachers, (Note, 3:1,2.) not allowing themselves to dispute of things beyond their depth; and not indulging a conceited loquacious humor; as speaking for the sake of speaking, or in the hope of obtaining applause, without due seriousness, modesty, recollection, and prudence. They should also be “slow to wrath;” not giving way to angry tempers, bitterness of spirit against opposers, or proneness to acrimonious controversy, under a mistaken notion of great zeal for the truth. On the contrary, they should be slow and backward to entertain or express any kind or degree of resentment, even against their most cruel persecutors; assured that “the wrath of man” was not a proper means of promoting the interests of religion in the world, or leading men to embrace the gospel and lead holy lives. (Notes, 3:13—18, 4:1—6.) For such proud contentions, and violent tempers tended still more to prejudice the minds of unbelievers against the gospel; to disturb the peace and corrupt the purity of the church; to multiply iniquities, and in every way to hinder the knowledge and practice of “the righteousness of God.” The apostle therefore exhorted all who might read his epistle, to “lay apart,” and to cast off with abhorrence, as a filthy garment, the sinful practices of their past lives, which were abominable in the sight of God; and especially to avoid and repress the “overflowings,” or abundance, of malignity, which many indulged under the notion of zeal; whereas they proceeded entirely from the predominancy of pride, wrath, envy, and other hateful passions. Thus they ought to be prepared, to “receive the word of God” in a meek, docile, humble, and peaceable frame of mind. (Note, 1 Pet. 2:1—3.) For it could profit them, only when it became an “engrafted word,” or implanted word, living and growing in the soul by faith and love, as the principle of a new nature; changing their views, judgment, dispositions, and affections, into conformity to his own holiness, and so producing suitable fruit in their lives. And being thus received and engrafted it would powerfully effect the complete salvation of their souls, as the means by which the Spirit of God began, carried on, and would perfect his new creation of the soul to holiness. (Note, 2 Tim. 3:14—17.)

23 For if any be <sup>g</sup> a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass;

Note.—In order that “the word of truth” might produce these blessed effects, on the souls of those who heard it; they must “be doers of it, and not hearers only.” For if they were “only hearers;” however attentive, constant, or teachable they might seem to be; their neglect of practising what they had heard would prove, that the word was not engrafted in their hearts, and that they were putting a most fatal imposition on themselves, by some specious but delusive and sophistical reasoning: whether custom, curiosity, or love of speculation, or a vain confidence in knowledge without obedience, for salvation, induced them to attend. A man of this description, who heard the gospel, and did not obey its call to repentance, faith in Christ, and a sober, righteous, and godly life, was like a person, who gave a transient look at “his natural face,” as reflected from a mirror, without attempting to alter what was unbecoming in his attire or appearance; who would therefore immediately depart, and soon “forget what manner of man he was:” and the glimpse which he had of himself would have no abiding effect on him. 13:18,19. Luke 6:46—49. 11:27,28.) Thus, the mere hearer might have short-lived convictions of his sinfulness: but displeased with the view given of his state, heart, and character, in the mirror of the sacred word, and having no effectual desires of an entire change; he would soon lose sight of his transient discoveries, in the company, business, and pleasures of the world, and so remain ignorant of himself, and destitute of transforming grace. But “whosoever looked,” steadfastly and attentively, into the word of God, with a real desire of learning from it his true state and character, and the way of acceptance and salvation; and “continued” with perseverance in this important inquiry: he, “not being a forgetful hearer,” but one who reduced to practice what he learned from time to time, though it cost him much humiliation and self-denial, would be “blessed in his deed,” or in his doing: the Lord would in this way lead him into the knowledge of his truth and salvation; his obedience would evidence the sincerity of his faith; his sanctification would proportionably advance, as he became acquainted with God and with himself; and his gracious recompense hereafter would succeed his present peace and comfort.—Some by “the perfect law of liberty,” suppose the moral law to be intended, in opposition to the ceremonial: and it certainly deserves that title in itself, as perfect obedience to it is perfect liberty, and every deviation from it is slavery; but then it cannot give liberty to us sinners. Others; therefore, suppose the gospel to be intended; because by it we are set at liberty from condemnation, and the bondage of sin. But divine revelation in general seems to be meant; as every part of it has its use, in bringing the sinner to Christ for salvation, and in directing and encouraging him to walk at liberty, by the Spirit of adoption, according to the holy commandments of God. In the word of truth, as the law, or rule, of obtaining and enjoying liberty, the true Christian looks as into a mirror; that he may discover the remaining unholiness of his temper, affections, words, and actions; in order that his soul may be purified from defilement, beautified with salvation, and transformed into the holy image of God, continually more and more. 26 If any man among you <sup>p</sup> seem to be religious, <sup>q</sup> and bridlet<sup>h</sup> not his tongue, <sup>r</sup> but deceiveth his own heart, <sup>s</sup> this man's religion is vain.

Note.—So necessary was practice, in every particular, to the very existence of real Christianity; that if “any man,” among professed believers, appeared to be a devout worshipper of God, according to the doctrine and ordinances of the gospel; and if his conduct in other respects were not reprehensible, yet, in case he habitually neglected to bridle his tongue, and so gave a loose to vain, polluting, ostentatious, or improper discourse; especially if he uttered bitter, malicious, slanderous, or reviling words, in an unrestrained manner, under pretence of zeal against such as differed from him; and “deceived his own heart” by one vain excuse or another, to think this was allowable, or consistent with the Christian temper: his religion was thus proved to be vain and worthless, his heart was not right in the sight of God, whilst “out of the abundance” of it such evil things habitually proceeded; but he was “in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity.” (Notes, 3:3—12. Ps. 39:1—4. Matt. 12:33—37. Rom. 3:9—18. Eph. 4:29. 5:3,4. Col. 3:7—11.) This is the general interpretation; and nothing more is supposed to have been intended. Yet men do not bridle horses, merely to restrain them from mischief, or from going in a wrong way; but likewise in order to rule and direct them in the right way; that they may be useful, and not merely inoffensive. Surely then, the refraining from evil discourse, and not perverting the gift of speech, by which man is distinguished from all other creatures here below, is far from the whole, which is intended by “bridling the tongue!” Beyond doubt, the proper improvement of that important talent is also meant: the tongue must be held in, and kept from improper discourse, and directed to that conversation, which tends “to the use of edifying,” and is suited to “minister grace unto the hearers.” It will perhaps be found, that those who have any regard to God and their duty, offend as frequently by silence, when they ought to speak, as by speaking, when they should be silent: but sins of omission are generally less regarded than sins of commission. How often do cowardice, indolence, and lukewarmness, make us silent; when holy courage, active zeal, and fervent love, would excite us to attempt “a word in season,” which God often most eminently blesses. him; and in taking pleasure from these motives, in visiting "orphans, widows," and other afflicted or destitute persons; to soothe their sorrows, relieve their wants, and afford them protection, counsel, and comfort in their distresses: and in keeping at a distance from the sinful pursuits, interests, pleasures, maxims, fashions, and pollutions of this wicked world; so that a man may have no stain upon his garments, no blemish on his character, no guilt upon his conscience, on that account.—Without some measure of this holy love, and this mortification to the world, no doctrines, forms, confidence, high affections, zeal, or apparent devotion, can prove a man an accepted worshipper of God. Our true religion is exactly equal to the measure, in which these things have place in our hearts, experience, and conduct; and these are therefore the criteria of "pure and undefiled religion," by which we should judge of it, in ourselves and in others, both as to the reality of it, and the degree in which it is possessed. But this holy love, and mortification to the world, can be produced only by faith in a crucified Saviour, and the supply of his sanctifying Spirit; so that no appearance even of these things can be depended on, except they spring from, and are connected with, a credible and intelligent profession of faith, a reliance on the mercy of God in Christ Jesus for salvation, and the regular and fervent worship of God, in public and in private. ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

"The servants of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ," must consider themselves, as employed to do good to the chosen tribes of the true Israel, through all their dispersions in this evil world, in every way, which they are able.—"Divers temptations" we must meet with: and if we "fall into them" without our own fault, and have only the distress of bearing them, without the guilt of yielding to them; we may deem it a great cause of joy to be thus proved and purified in the furnace, and made meet for future honor and felicity. (Note, Heb. 2:16—18.) For these painful but short trials tend to reduce the gracious heart into a more submissive temper, and a more cordial acquiescence in the will of God: and when patience, in its various exercises, has "its perfect work," it meliorates all the dispositions and affections of the soul; produces a peculiar simplicity, humility, and tenderness; corrects the harshness and roughness natural to many of us; and matures "the fruits of righteousness" to the greatest advantage. In this severe school the Christian makes his greatest proficiency; and becomes "perfect and entire," in every part of his temper and conduct, according to the measure of attainment which may be arrived at in this world; and is defective in nothing requisite for the due performance of the services required of him. But in respect of this, and every other part of our conduct, we shall feel that we "are deficient in wisdom," in proportion as we become acquainted with ourselves: nor shall we, if we reverence the scriptures seek it in the schools of philosophy, or from the counsels of the wise men of this world; but we shall ask the precious boon of God, and obtain the substance, while others are deceived with an empty shadow. As "God giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not;" (Note, Matt. 11:20—24.) and has engaged that wisdom shall be given to them, who ask it of him; every man, who feels his want of heavenly wisdom, may apply to him for this inestimable benefit, without fear of meeting a refusal. (Notes, 4:1—3. Matt. 7:7—11. Luke 11:5—13.) Did we fully avail ourselves of this privilege, how greatly should we be enriched with divine knowledge; and how prudently should we conduct all our concerns, and avoid every snare and device of our enemies! But pride, prejudice, and a carnal mind, co-operating with unbelief, not only preclude multitudes entirely from these treasures; but, in some degree, prevent all of us from drawing from them so copiously as we otherwise might do.—If men be divided in their judgment, between a dependence on the promises of God, in the use of appointed means, and other methods of seeking wisdom; if, instead of "trusting in the Lord with all their hearts, they lean to their own understandings," and "are wise in their own conceits;" if they do not really believe that the Lord will be as good as his word; or if they question whether heavenly things are decidedly preferable to earthly; no wonder, that they are like "the waves of the sea, which are driven with the wind and tossed;" and while they receive nothing from God, they have none to blame but themselves. When we see so many of these "double-minded" men on every side, who "are unstable in all their ways;" we are reminded to pray for the increase of faith, that we may waver no more, but trust in the Lord, and cleave to him alone. (Notes, Ps. 51:10. Acts 11:23,24. 1 Cor. 15:55—58.)

If there were any substantial satisfaction in earthly things, there might be some speciousness in attempting to "serve God and Mammon:" but as all below is "vanity and vexation of spirit;" the poor believer may well rejoice in being exalted to an interest in Christ, and in the prospect of glory in heaven, though he have all kind of hardships by the way; and the rich have at least equal cause for rejoicing, if God has humbled them before his mercy-seat, though the world despise and hate them on that account; nay, though they should be stripped of their possessions and reduced to poverty for the cause of Christ. For "the fashion of this world passeth away," and all its magnificence and show of happiness fade and withereth, "like the flower of the grass;" and most miserable are those rich men, who "fade away" in the pride of ungodly prosperity. But "blessed are they," who patiently endure trials, and manfully resist temptation; for "through much tribulation shall they enter into the kingdom of God;" and "having been tried" and approved, "they shall receive the" unfading "crown of glory, which God hath promised to them that love him." But let not hypocrites, who being tempted to renounce the profession of the gospel, yield to the temptation, and cannot endure the trial; or believers, who through unwatchfulness are overcome in some sharp conflict, venture for a moment to say, or think, that they are "tempted by God;" "for he cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man;" and if a man dare thus foolishly to charge God with being the Author of sin, in any way, or on any pretence; he may certainly expect some dreadful rebuke of his presumption. For when the depravity of the heart has influenced men to hearken to Satan's enticements and catch at his baits; and so sin has been conceived and finished, and condemnation justly incurred; it is no less than blasphemy to throw the blame upon the righteous providence, or decrees, or holy commandments of God. Such inferences from important truths, ill understood, should be carefully avoided; whilst we remember that "every good and perfect gift cometh down from the unchangeable Father of light," the inexhaustible Fountain of wisdom, holiness, and felicity.—But if we be "Christians indeed," the Lord has, "according to his determinate purpose," and "the counsel of his own will," begotten us again with the word of truth: we should therefore give him all the glory of this happy change, and consecrate all our faculties to his service, that we may be "a kind of first-fruits of his creatures," and blessings to all around us.

V. 19—27.

It behoves us all to be "swift to hear, slow to speak, and slow to wrath;" even when religious zeal, as we may suppose, prompts us to a different conduct: for "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God;" but is the scandal and bane of every society, in which it is indulged. Let us then "lay apart all filthiness, and the overflowings of maliciousness," and every kind of wickedness; that we may receive with humble teachableness, and maintain with "meekness" and love, the sacred truths contained in the holy scriptures; which, being engrained in the heart, are effectual to the salvation of our souls. But, while we are "swift to hear" the word of God, let us take care to be "doers of it, and not hearers only; lest we deceive our own souls:" for many such are found in the best instructed congregations; who deceive scarcely any but themselves.—The word of God is a faithful mirror, to show us the deformity and pollution of our souls; and a monitor, to teach us how we may remove them, and adorn ourselves with the beauties of holiness. Happy would it be for mankind, were they in general as assiduous in seeking this inward, durable, and spiritual adorning; as they are in decorating their poor mortal bodies, that they may appear comely in the eyes of their fellow-worms! Transient glimpses, however, and notional discoveries, leave mere hearers unchanged; and a large majority choose, and even endeavor to go away from the most faithful sermon, and "forget what manner of persons they are." But "whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty," and meditates continually on the holy word of God, not as "a forgetful hearer," but as an obedient believer, shall be "blessed in his deed;" for in this way he shall find out whatever in his heart and conduct needs repentance, forgiveness, and the "sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience;" thus Christ will become more precious to his soul; and by his grace he will daily grow more and more "meet for the inheritance of the saints in light," and have more abundant anticipations of their holy felicity.—But our "words" must be attended to, as well as our actions: for, "whatever appearances" there may be of true religion, in the creed, worship, and outward conduct of any man; yet, if he "bridle not his tongue," he "deceiveth his own heart, and all his religion is vain." No wonder that disputatious, contentious, and noisy talkers about forms and doctrines, disrelish this epistle; when the unbridled licence indulged to their tongues exposes them to an unequalled charge of total hypocrisy, in the very opening of it. But, while we depend on the mercy of God in Christ Jesus for all things pertaining to salvation; let us remember the essential nature of "pure and undefiled religion before God, even our Father;" let us show our love to him by "visiting the fatherless and widows in their affliction," and seek grace from him to preserve us "unspotted from the world." For nothing "availeth" in Christ Jesus, but faith which "worketh by love," "purifieth the heart," subdues carnal lusts, and obeys God's commandments. (Notes, Gal. 5:1—6. 1 John 2:15—17.)

CHAP. II.

Caution against partial regard to the rich, and contempt of the poor, especially in places of worship, as contrary to the law of love. 1—9. The transgression of one commandment violates the whole law, 10—12. No mercy will be shown to the unmerciful, 13. As love, shown by words alone, is worthless: so faith without works is dead and unprofitable, 14—20. This is illustrated by the examples of Abraham and Rahab, 21—26.

3 And <sup>g</sup> ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here <sup>h</sup> in a good place; and say <sup>h</sup> to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool:

4 Are ye not then <sup>i</sup> partial in yourselves, and are become <sup>k</sup> judges of evil thoughts?

Note.—While the persons whom the apostle addressed, held the doctrine of Christ, and professed faith in him as "the Lord of glory," most glorious in himself, and the Source of all that was honorable in men; they ought to take care not to show "respect of persons;" giving honor to some, and despising others, on account of external circumstances and appearances, without estimating the comparative value or worthlessness of their characters: for this would be very inconsistent with professing themselves the disciples of the lowly Jesus.—For instance, if any person, adorned with rings on his fingers, and costly garments, as one of high rank in the community, should come into their assembly, when they were met for the worship of God, as the Jews did in their synagogues; and another should at the same time enter, in mean, coarse, or worn out clothes, as a poor man; and they should pay great attention to him in gay clothing, accommodating him with some chief place in the synagogue, or place of worship; and contemptuously order the poor man to stand in some inconvenient place, or to sit on the ground at their feet, without adverting to the character and conduct of each: would not this prove that they were partial, or prejudiced, in forming an opinion in themselves concerning others, and were become judges, who were misled by vain reasonings and imaginations, by unjust thoughts and corrupt affections? For their conduct would show, that they deemed wealth and splendor, however acquired or used, to be honorable; and poverty, however incurred or supported, to be disgraceful: forgetting that “the Lord of glory” was pleased to be poor for the sake of sinners, to enrich them with eternal felicity. (Notes, 5—7. 1:1,9—11. Prov. 14:21,31. 17:5. Matt. 11:2—6. Luke 7:36. Rom. 12:14—16. 2 Cor. 6:3—10. 8:6—9.)—Some expositors, supposing that the passage thus interpreted could scarcely consist with rendering honor to civil superiors, as required in other scriptures, have endeavored to explain it of partiality in deciding causes, in favor of the rich, and against the poor; because some courts of justice used to be held in the Jewish synagogues. But had the apostle intended to point out so gross an iniquity, he would doubtless have spoken of it with far more decided severity. If such partiality were used in the determinations of those matters, which came before the churches, it would certainly be condemned by what he said: yet the language does not at all relate to judicial proceedings of any kind; but to an improper respect shown towards some, and contempt expressed towards others, merely on account of external appearance.—No doubt this is very reprehensible, and the effect of a carnal judgment, how common soever it may be: nor does civil respect to superiors, or to those in authority, render such difference of conduct towards the rich and the poor, in religious concerns, at all necessary: especially when the rich have nothing but their wealth and splendor to recommend them; and the poor are persons of pious character and good behavior. As places of worship cannot be built and maintained, without much expense; it may be proper that they, who contribute towards defraying it, should be accommodated accordingly: but were all professed Christians more spiritually minded, less disparity would be made, and the poor would be treated with far more attention and regard, than they commonly are in worshipping congregations. And we may conclude without the least hesitation, that if the apostle could witness what takes place generally in our days, in this matter, and give his opinion of it; he would repeat the censure that we were “become partial in ourselves,” and “judges” influenced by evil thoughts, corrupt reasonings, and erroneous calculations; and add many like, and even more severe words.—Our Lord, &c. 5<sup>1</sup> Harken, my beloved brethren, <sup>m</sup> Hath not God chosen the poor of this world, <sup>n</sup> rich in faith, and <sup>o</sup> heirs of * the kingdom <sup>p</sup> which he hath promised to them that love him?

7 Do not they <sup>t</sup> blaspheme that <sup>u</sup> worthy name <sup>x</sup> by the which ye are called?

Note.—The apostle endeavored to fix the attention of his brethren on the subject, by inquiring, whether they did not know that “God had chosen the poor of this world.” Were not his people generally of that rank in life, with only a few exceptions? (Marg. Ref. m.—Note, 1 Cor. 1:26—31.) If the Lord therefore chiefly blessed the gospel, for the conversion of the poor, it must be evident, that he had appointed that lowly state for his chosen people, as the safest, most comfortable, and advantageous for them; as most conducive to their progressive sanctification, most favorable to their inward peace, and most suited to show forth the power and blessed effects, of his grace bestowed on them. For he could have given them the riches and honors of this world, if he had seen that these would have done them good; but he had chosen them to be “rich in faith,” partakers of all “the unsearchable riches of Christ,” and all the “exceedingly great and precious promises” of the scripture; and to be “heirs of the kingdom,” which he had engaged to bestow on all those, who were taught by his grace to love him and his holy ways; which comprised such a confluence of honor, authority, greatness, riches, and enjoyments, as no earthly kingdom could ever make claim to. It was therefore evident, that the Lord peculiarly honored and favored men of low condition: whereas his worshippers despised the poor, and slighted them, as if beneath their notice! Or, they “despised the poor man;” for the word is singular. (Notes, Prov. 15:21,31. 17:5. Ec. 9:13—18. Luke 2:1—14.)—Did they not also know that rich men were generally oppressors and persecutors, and dragged them before their iniquitous tribunals, to condemn them for their religion? And did they not often hear the rich revile and “blaspheme the name” of Christ, from whom they were called Christians, and which they considered as worthy of all honor and worship? (Note, 5:1—6.) Could they then imagine, that the enemies of Christ and his church, and persons of the worst characters, ought to be treated with more respect, on account of wealth alone, than their poor brethren and neighbors were entitled to?—This implies, that the apostle principally referred to the case of such rich persons, as occasionally came to their assemblies, to whom vast attention was paid, whilst the poor were despised; whereas the latter were far more likely to profit by the word preached, than the former. He does not seem to have meant, that the rich, who were stated attendants on their assemblies, and pious persons, ought to have no degree of superior regard shown them; provided the poor were not despised and neglected.—One of the last observations which the author heard from the lips of a very wealthy and zealous servant of Christ, (John Thornton, Esq.) was this: ‘Ministers in London bestow more pains to get full congregations, than to profit those who attend; and aim more at the rich, than the poor: but they will always be most successful with the poor. These are two principal mistakes.’

9 But <sup>b</sup> if ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and <sup>c</sup> are convinced <sup>d</sup> of the law as transgressors.

10 For <sup>e</sup> whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all.

11 For * he that said, <sup>f</sup> Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill. <sup>g</sup> Now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the law.

Note.—The apostle reminded his brethren, that they would do well, if they attended to and fulfilled the comprehensive scriptural precept, “Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,” in the several parts of their conduct towards each other. This might be called “a royal law,” because of its pre-eminent excellency and permanent authority; and because it was the law of Christ their King, respecting their conduct towards one another, and all men. (Notes, Lev. 19:18—34. Matt. 7:12. 22:39. Mark 12:28—34. Luke 10:25—29. Rom. 13:8—10. Gal. 5:13—15.)—It is of vast importance to observe, how often this abstract of the second table of the law is referred to in the New Testament, as a rule of conduct to believers; as this alone is sufficient to show the fatal mistake of those, who deny the moral law to be the rule of our duty.—If then Christians had “respect of persons,” treating the poor with contempt, and paying court to the rich; they evidently “committed sin,” and acted unjustly, and consequently were convicted by the law as transgressors; as they did not show an equal love to their poor brethren. For, if they were obedient in all other things to the law, and only offended in one single particular, they were guilty of all: that is, they broke the law, and fell under its condemnation, as certainly, though not so deeply, by transgressing one precept, as if they had broken them all; even as a man is liable to the sentence of death, by the law of this land, who offends in one capital matter, though he be clear in all others. The chain, consisting of many links, is broken, when any one link is broken. According to the covenant of works, a single violation of any one command brings a man under condemnation, from which no obedience, past, present, or future, can deliver him: and, according to the covenant of grace, the allowed, known, and habitual transgression of any part of the moral law, as given to us from the hands of a Mediator, proves a professed Christian to be impenitent, a hypocrite, an unreconciled enemy, and a rebel against God; and that his obedience, in other respects, is not the result of a sincere regard to the authority and glory of God. For if it were, the same principle would induce him to a constant endeavor and purpose of obeying every commandment. The authority, which prohibited “adultery,” forbade “murder” also; and the same was the case with every other requirement of the law: therefore a violation of any one of them constituted the man a transgressor, and implied rebellion against the Law-giver. Some would perhaps object, that they “were not under the law but under grace;” and therefore they might be in a state of acceptance, though the law condemned their conduct in various particulars. But, though this, in a certain sense, was indeed the case with true believers; yet it behoved them in every respect to speak and act as persons, who were to be judged according to "the perfect law of liberty." (Note, 1:22—25.) For the whole tenor of revelation; and the gospel itself, by which men were set at liberty from condemnation, and every yoke of bondage, would condemn all those who did not repent, and forsake every sin, and obey the commandments of God, in sincerity and simplicity, from faith and love to the Lord Jesus. So that, if they habitually allowed themselves in the practice of any known sin, the gospel would adjudge them to be unbelievers. especially those who showed no mercy to their neighbors, inferiors, and dependents, would "have judgment without mercy," and be punished with the utmost rigor of the law; for no man could be a true believer, whose heart was not humbled and softened into a compassionate, forgiving, kind, and loving disposition. (Notes, Matt. 5: 7. 6:12,14,15. 18:21—35.)—The exercise of mercy indeed might be ascertained by its "rejoicing against judgment," and by any one's taking pleasure in abating from the demands of rigorous justice, and showing kindness to those who had no legal claim to favor. Thus God deemed it his glory and joy, to pardon and bless those, who might justly have been condemned at his tribunal; his grace taught those who were partakers of his mercy, to copy it in their conduct towards their afflicted and offending brethren; and all, who were not taught to show mercy to others, must themselves expect to be dealt with, according to the severity of justice in respect of their eternal state.—What then must be the doom of the cruel oppressors and iniquitous tyrants of the human species?—Some explain the expression "mercy rejoiceth against judgment" to denote the cheerful expectation of a future judgment, with which the exercise of mercy to others inspires the true Christian's heart. But though this may be implied, it seems not to be the proper meaning of the passage, or construction of the words; for to "glory against," or "to rejoice against," does most properly denote, to rejoice and glory in obtaining the ascendancy or victory over a competitor; as mercy is figuratively represented to do, over the severity of God's judgment, when they are justified and saved, who deserve to be condemned.

14 <sup>m</sup> What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and have not works? ° can faith save him?

16 And <sup>q</sup> one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed, and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; <sup>r</sup> what doth it profit?

17 Even <sup>s</sup> so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being * alone.

18 Yea, a man may say, 'Thou hast faith, and I have works: show me thy faith † without thy works, <sup>u</sup> and I will show thee my faith by my works.

Note.—It is plain, that the apostle here argued against those, who substituted a notional belief of the gospel, for the whole of evangelical religion; and who were ready to answer exhortations and reproofs, (as many now do,) by saying, 'We are not justified by our works, but by faith; we believe, and we have all things in Christ.' He therefore inquired of them, what it profited a man "though he said that he had faith, and had no works" of true piety and holiness; to which he could appeal as the fruits and evidence of it. "Could faith save him?" No doubt true faith, interesting men in the righteousness of Christ, his atonement and grace, saves their souls: (Notes, Mark 16:14—16. John 3:14—16. 5:24—27. 20:30,31. 1 Cor. 15:1,2. Eph. 2:4—10.) but then it also produces holy fruits, and is evinced to be genuine by its effect on their hearts and lives: whereas, a speculative assent to any doctrine, or an historical belief of any facts, essentially differs from this saving faith. The worthlessness of such a dead faith is here shown by an apposite illustration. If any poor Christians were destitute of proper clothing, or food for the day; and so in urgent distress, or in danger of perishing: and a professed believer, who was able to relieve them, should avow much brotherly love, and in very affectionate words express a cordial wish and desire, that they might be furnished with raiment and support by some kind friend; but at the same time should give them nothing towards the supply of their urgent necessities; would any man be so destitute of common sense, as to suppose these unmeaning expressions constituted that most excellent grace of "brotherly love," which Christ and his apostles so greatly insisted on and extolled? Or would a poor starving person be persuaded to account it any better, than a cruel mockery of his misery? (Notes, John 13: 31—35. 1 Cor. 13:4—7. 1 John 3:16—24.) What then would such a love profit, either the possessor or his poor brother?—Thus faith is most excellent and advantageous, when genuine and efficacious; yet that faith, which has no good works springing from it, is "dead;" and, as it is inactive and unfruitful, so it can by no means justify the possessor; being alone, and separated from repentance, love to God and man, and every other holy affection; even as the eye cannot see, if alone, and dead, being separated from the body, of which the seeing eye forms a living part. It would therefore be most absurd to suppose, that the Lord would approve such a faith, when no poor Christian would value love of exactly the same kind. So that a Christian, who was more attentive "to the work of faith and labor of love," than to the disputations profession of certain doctrines, being questioned by one of another character, might say to him, "Thou hast faith, and I have works; show me therefore, thy faith without thy works," if any conceivable method can be found of doing this; and in the mean time, 'I will show thee, and all around me, that faith 'in Christ influences and rules in my heart, by 'the works of a sober, righteous, and godly 'life.' Most copies read, "Show me thy faith by thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works."—"Thou professest to believe, 'and disgracest that profession by thy conduct; 'but do not expect to be considered as a be- 'liever, till thou showest thy faith by the good 'works of a holy life; and thou censurest me, 'as not sufficiently exact, or zealous in respect 'of faith; but I deem it better to evince it by 'my works, than by disputing about it.' Either reading warrants the same inference; namely, that there is no possible way to show that we really do believe in Christ, except by being "zealous of good works," from evangelical motives and for evangelical purposes; and where good works are evidently wanting, the most confident profession, of the most orthodox creed, can only prove a man to be a well-instructed hypocrite, who has received a system of doctrine into his understanding as true; but has never been so convinced of its excellency, as to admit it into his heart, experimentally, as the influential principle of his conduct towards God and man. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—16. Gal. 5:1—6. 1 Thes. 1:1—4. Heb. 11:1:—"He has received the knowledge of the truth." but not "the love of the truth." (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:8—12. Heb. 10:26,27.)—"A wicked opinion having sprung up, even in the apostle's days, by 'misunderstanding Paul's arguments; Peter, 'John, James, and Jude, aimed in their epistles 'principally at this end; to vindicate the doc- 'trine of Paul, from the false consequences 'charged upon it, and to show that "faith with- 'out works is nothing worth." But indeed 'Paul does not speak of faith at large; but only 'of that living, fruitful, and evangelical faith, 'which he says, "worketh by love." As for 'that faith, void of good works, which these 'men thought sufficient to salvation, he declar- 'eth positively against it.—Peter calls it wrest- 'ing; (2 Pet. 3:6.) because Paul was in truth 'of the same opinion with the other apostles, 'and held eternal life impossible to be attained 'by any faith, which had not the attestation of 'a holy life.' Augustine.

20 But wilt thou know, <sup>a</sup> O vain man, <sup>b</sup> that faith without works is dead?

Note.—To show the vanity of such a faith, as did not influence the heart and conduct, the apostle mentioned the fundamental article of all religion, the existence of one God, as the only Object of all worship and service, and as distinguished from all the objects of idolatrous worship. Now the professed Christian, before described, believed this important truth, but without making any practical use of it. No doubt he acted more properly in believing it, than those did who denied it; but of what advantage could this be to him, seeing the very devils believed it also? Nay, they trembled at the thoughts of the omnipotent power and righteous vengeance of the "one living and true God;" yet they continued impudently to hate his perfections, government, cause, and service. If any man therefore believed all the truths of the gospel, in the same manner, with the utmost exactness; he could not know them more accurately, or assent to them with greater certainty, than devils did. Would not then the vain antinomian disputer be at length convinced, by the testimony of an apostle, and such irrefragable arguments, that "faith without works was dead," worthless, and useless; like a dead tree, fit only to be cut down and cast into the fire; or a dead corpse, to be buried out of sight, that its putrefaction might not annoy the living?—It is vain to say, as some have done; that devils are not under a dispensation of mercy, and therefore they have no ground for appropriating the revelation, and promise of salvation to themselves. For the apostle is not speaking of the different circumstances of fallen angels, and fallen men; but of the difference between dead, inactive, inefficient faith, and that "faith which worketh by love;" and his argument proves, beyond all doubt, that a faith, which is of no better kind than that of the devils, cannot possibly profit the possessor, however he may be circumstanced: for this plain reason, because it is not that faith, to which the promises are made.

23 And <sup>h</sup> the scripture was fulfilled which saith, <sup>i</sup> Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness: and he was called <sup>k</sup> the friend of God.

24 Ye <sup>l</sup> see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only.

Note.—The apostle next proved his assertion by examples.—Was not Abraham, the father of the Israelites, and spiritually of believers, “justified by works,” when at God’s command he did not hesitate to offer his beloved Isaac for a burnt-offering? (Notes, Gen. 22:1—18. Heb. 11:17—19.) Did not his works evidence the reality and holy efficacy of his faith, and prove him accepted before God? The attentive reader must see, in what a powerful manner his faith in the promises of God operated to produce good works, in obedience to his commands, in the most trying circumstances, universally, and without reserve. Thus “by works was his faith made perfect;” as the tree is in its perfect state, when grown to maturity, and loaded on every branch with abundance of valuable fruit: and the scripture was fulfilled, which declared that “Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness.” (Notes, Gen. 15:5,6. Rom. 6:1—3,9—25. Gal. 3:6—14,26—29. Heb. 6:13—20. 11:8—16.) In consequence of this he was admitted to such a state of peace and intimate communion with God, that he was honored with the privileges and appellation of “the friend of God,” or “lover of God.” (Marg. Ref. k.)—Abraham’s justification by faith took place many years before he was commanded to sacrifice Isaac: but his obedience in that respect proved him to be a sound character, and justified him as a true believer, and a devoted servant of God. So that it was evident, there was a good and important sense, in which “a man was justified by works and not by faith only;” as his works must be appealed to, for the justification of his professed faith before men; and as they will be adduced before the tribunal of God, to distinguish true believers from hypocrites: (Notes, Matt. 25:34—46. 2 Cor. 5:9—12.) nor will faith justify any man before God, who is not justified before the world by his works also. Not that this will be a second justification by works, in the sense for which many contend; as the redemption and righteousness of Christ, depended on by living faith, can alone “justify a sinner before God,” from first to last: but the good works of the true believer, from the time when he received Christ, to that of his death, how long or how short soever that space may be, will suffice to distinguish his living faith from the dead faith of mere professors, to justify him against every charge of hypocrisy; and to prove him entitled “to the gift of God, even eternal life through Jesus Christ.”

25 Likewise also <sup>m</sup> was not Rahab the harlot <sup>n</sup> justified by works, <sup>o</sup> when she had received the messengers, and had sent them out another way?

26 For <sup>p</sup> as the body without the * spirit is dead, <sup>q</sup> so faith without works is dead also.

Note.—In like manner, even Rahab, who had been a harlot, was “justified by works,” when her faith wrought by love to the people of JEHOVAH, and she entertained the messengers, and dismissed them in peace “by another way” than their pursuers had gone: and this she did at the hazard of her life. (Notes, Josh. 2: Heb. 11:31.) Her conduct proved her faith to be living and influential; it showed that she did indeed believe with her heart, and not merely by an inefficacious assent of the understanding.—For, as the human body, when destitute of the spirit or soul, is a mere dead corpse, without motion or activity, however exactly formed in every part, and thus differs essentially from a living man; even so, “faith without works” is a dead carcass, not only worthless, but polluting and offensive.—It is unnecessary to use further arguments, to prove the consistency of James’ doctrine with that of the apostle Paul. St. Paul evidently meant, that faith alone interested a sinner in the mercy of God, through the redemption and righteousness of Christ, for justification: but the faith, of which he spoke, “wrought by love” “constraining to obedience,” and was connected with a new creation unto holiness. St. James meant, that no faith, which was not productive of good works, could justify a man before God: that a speculative assent, or an indolent reliance, separate from repentance, diligence in the use of appointed means, and holy obedience, “was dead” and unprofitable; and that consequently, there was a sound sense, in which a man might be said to be justified by his works, and in perfect consistency with “his faith being imputed to him for righteousness;” as in the case of Abraham. But St. Paul opposed those who objected to the doctrine of justification by faith, and St. James wrote against such as perverted it. Both views of the subject are useful to the humble, upright, and attentive: but the Lord sees good, that the self-wise, the proud, the heedless, and the licentious, should have somewhat to cavail at and stumble over. Indeed the same interpretation, which is necessary to render one part of these verses consistent with another; at the same time renders them consistent with the doctrine of St. Paul, concerning justification by faith (23).—“It is one thing to say, that the faith which is without works “is dead,” and another to say, that faith is dead “without works; as if faith derived its life and power from works; which is not less ... absurd, than if we should say that the body is dead “without sense and motion, as if sense and motion were the cause of life; when we should say, that the body, which is without sense and motion, is dead: for the cause is understood from the necessary effects; and works are the evidences and effects of living faith, and not “the cause of it.” Beza.—The apostle frequently calls the faith which does not justify dead. but he does not use the word living; and some persons are so absurd as to ask what we mean by living faith! The simple answer is,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-7.

The Lord Jesus is the true Fountain of honor; and they are the most honorable, who best serve him and most resemble him, whatever their external rank or appearance may be. But how difficult is it for us to divest ourselves of carnal reasonings, and corrupt prejudices, in such matters; and to give due respect to superiors, without a partial regard to the affluence and splendor, which too often are the appendages, or heralds, of vice and folly! But if this does not become the disciple of the lowly Jesus; it is still more criminal to treat the poor with contempt, because of their mean garments, and indigent circumstances; when perhaps they are adorned with wisdom and grace, angels delight in ministering to them, and Christ rejoices over them to do them good. (Notes, Prov. 14:21, 22, 31. 17:5.) We should watch and pray against so corrupt a judgment, and such evil thoughts, and false reasonings, in all cases; but especially in the worship of God, before whom "the rich and the poor meet together," and are regarded entirely according to their characters, and not in the least according to their rank. (Note, Prov. 22:2.) It is greatly to be desired, that every degree or appearance of the evil here reprov'd, could be removed from our congregations; and that we should more constantly remember, that "God hath chosen the poor of this world, to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to those who love him."—The poor should hence learn to seek these riches and honors, and the assurance of them, with increasing earnestness; to be contented in their low estate, to rejoice in their spiritual privileges, to be cheerful in the humble duties of their station, to be thankful for their advantages; and to pray for their rich neighbors, that they may not be satisfied with a perishing inheritance. The rich also should learn to "rejoice with trembling," in their perilous pre-eminence; (Note, Ps. 2:10-12.) not to trust in their earthly treasures, and not to despise their poor brethren; but to seek the true riches, and to improve their talents with a constant recollection of the approaching season, when they must "give an account of their stewardship," and be no longer stewards. For soon the condition of the wealthy oppressor, persecutor, and blasphemer of Christ, and that of the poor despised believer, will be reverse; when the latter will be comforted, and the former tormented, for evermore. (Notes, Luke 16:1-8, 19-31.)

V. 8-13.

We ought in all things to observe and endeavor to fulfil "the royal law of loving our neighbor as ourselves;" "but if we have respect of persons, we commit sin and are convicted as transgressors," even though we be not guilty of any gross violation of justice and truth. If our obedience be sincere, it will be universal, as far as we are acquainted with our Lord's will; for the same authority is opposed and affronted, whatever command is broken.—In vain do men urge that they are "not under the law," whilst they allow themselves in known sin; the very gospel will consign them over to the righteous vengeance of God, and all the curses of the law will be executed upon them, with a tremendous increase of punishment, for having "sinned on, that grace might abound." But the hard-hearted, selfish, implacable and oppressive professor of Christianity, has the greatest cause to tremble: for if "he shall have judgment without mercy, who hath shown no mercy;" the meanest slave, who ever was whipped and worked to death, must be considered as happy, compared with his haughty and cruel tyrant: and this will sufficiently appear, "when the earth shall disclose her blood and shall no more cover her slain." (Notes, Is. 26:20, 21.)

V. 14-26.

Vain men, while neglecting "judgment, mercy, and the love of God," (Note, Matt. 23:23, 24.) quiet their consciences, and ward off reproof, by speaking of faith, of grace, of salvation; but God will no more regard their heartless assent to truth, or their indolent, presumptuous reliance on his mercy, than their hollow expressions of love to their poor destitute neighbors. Let no man deceive himself: "faith, being alone," and not productive of good works, is no better than the faith of devils, and will leave the possessor in their company to all eternity. Would we have our inheritance with Abraham, "the friend of God;" (Note, John 15:12-16.) we must both believe his promise, trust his mercy, and obey his commandment: or else "publicans and harlots will enter heaven before us;" and a believing Rahab shall be "justified by her works," and distinguished from all open unbelievers, and from all those whose faith was dead, before the assembled world; when many disputers for orthodox creeds, which they have disgraced by their lives, shall "have their portion with the workers of iniquity, in outer darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth."

Note.—The word, rendered "masters," evidently signifies teachers. Indeed that is the obvious meaning of the word, when used concerning any of the Jewish Scribes, and of our Lord himself. Some ought to be "teachers;" but none ought to domineer, usurp authority in the church, or indulge a censorious arrogant temper.—"When the apostle forbids many to be such, he seems to allow that some may; and

'consequently I think "teachers" ought to be explained in an innocent sense.' Doddridge.—An arrogant, self-preferring, dogmatical temper, whether it led men, without a proper call or suitable qualifications, to aspire to the office of teachers, or whether it induced them to assume pre-eminence in other ways, was the general object of the apostle's reprehension: though the former, as the effect of such a temper, seems to have been principally intended. (Notes, Matt. 20:20—28. 23:8—12. Luke 22:24—27. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) Many converts to Christianity would be desirous of the distinction of "teachers;" with a view to the credit and pre-eminence of that office, or from a mistaken idea that they could not glorify God, and do good to man, in other stations: while perhaps they were not duly aware of the weight and difficulty of the work, and the solemn account which must be given of it. But they ought to know, and seriously consider, that "teachers" must stand a greater, or more strict, judgment than other men; and that false, unfaithful, ambitious and selfish teachers would be subject to a greater and more awful condemnation than other sinners. This is also, no doubt in a degree, applicable to the case of censorious, assuming, and domineering persons in any station. (Notes, 4:11,12. Matt. 7:1—6. Luke 6:37,38. 3 John 9—12.)—Indeed, even true believers, though preserved from final condemnation, if employed as teachers, must expect to be called to a more strict account than their brethren. As their conduct would be more severely scrutinized by men, than that of others; so they would be more sharply rebuked and chastened by God for their offences, in order to the display of his glory, and the prevention of scandals in the church: so that every attempt, made by any of them, to force themselves into eminent and conspicuous stations, would ensure a larger measure of painful and mortifying trials. (Note, 1 Cor. 11:29—34.) Nor could any man expect to behave so, as to escape correction or condemnation; for in many things all offended, without excepting the apostles themselves: all frequently "tripped," or stumbled, in their walk; and the more men were advanced and distinguished, the greater would be their dangers, the more noticed their transgressions, and the more needful their rebukes and chastisements. (Note, Ec. 10:1.) Especially, it would be found extremely difficult, to speak so much and so often, as the public and private duties of the ministry required, without often uttering unadvised words, dishonorable to God, injurious to men, or the result of pride, anger, or some unhallowed passion. So that idle and evil words must be multiplied, in consequence of men's improperly entering into the pastoral office: nor could any wholly escape this guilt; though such as were duly called to the service might expect proportionable grace and mercy. (Notes, Is. 6:5—8. Matt. 12:33—37.)—If indeed any man were able to "bridle his tongue," so as not at all to "offend in words," but always to improve aright the gift of speech; he must be "a perfect man," able also to govern, restrain, and use all the appetites, senses, and members of his body "as instruments of righteousness," in subserviency to the glory of God and in obedience to his will; seeing he was found able to govern the most unruly of them all. (Notes, 1:26. Rom. 6:16—19.) But no man had actually attained to this absolute perfection; for "in many things all offended;" yet the degree of a man's wisdom and grace might be ascertained by the measure, in which he was enabled to govern his tongue. So that, if nothing in principle or practice proved the contrary; he, who most avoided all improper words, and spake most to the glory of God and the edification of men, must be deemed the most eminent Christian: whereas falsehoods, boastings, revilings, and corrupt conversation, brought a man's character into suspicion or disrepute, whatever else seemed to be good in it.—The Jews at that time, even when grossly ignorant and vicious, were exceedingly prone to consider themselves, as called and qualified to be the religious teachers of mankind: (Note, Rom. 2:17—24.) and probably the apostle saw, that many of the Jewish converts to Christianity were influenced by the remains of the same disposition, to aspire prematurely, from questionable motives, or without proper qualifications and weight of character, to the office of teachers or ministers; which he counted it needful thus to repress.

ject, the apostle observed, that the estimate must not be made according to appearance, but by the effect. The horse, though a powerful and spirited animal, was commonly directed by the bit in his mouth, according to the will of the rider, and his whole body followed that guidance; whereas if the bridle were not used, and that properly, great danger and mischief would ensue. (Note, Ps. 32:8—11.) Even the ships, though often of vast bulk, and driven by violent winds on the impetuous ocean, might generally be guided by "a very small helm," according to the motion of the pilot's hand. Even so "the tongue, though a little member, boasted" and gloried of being able to do "great things." When properly bridled and directed, it could produce the most blessed effects; but if neglected, the most fatal consequences must follow. (Notes, 7—12. 1:26. Ps. 30:11,12. 57:7—11.) For let any man consider how vast a quantity of fuel a small match, or even a spark of fire, would suffice to kindle, and what tremendous conflagrations might follow: and hence he might learn the importance of the tongue; which is, in fact, a fire to destroy all before it, and "a world of iniquity," comprehending in the abuse of it, all the wickedness of the universe, in miniature, or rather in embryo. Its situation and office, "among our members," is such, that "it defileth the whole body," and inflames or gives vent to all those corrupt passions, by which men are instigated to commit the several vices, of which the other members are the instruments. Nay, it "setteth on fire the whole circle of nature," through every generation, and produces the most extensive and prolific mischiefs all over the earth. For it is "set on fire of hell;" as the devil, working on the various lusts of man's apostate nature, and exciting men to express their abominable thoughts by their tongues, disseminates, from one to another, all over the earth, atheism, infidelity, heresies, blasphemies, impiety, lies, slanders, emulations, discords, and lewdness, in immensely various forms, more refined and plausible, or more gross and vulgar, according to the company, in which it is intended to produce its malignant effects. From these sources all kinds and degrees of atrocious and destructive crimes continually proceed. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Judg. 12:1—7. 2 Sam. 19:40—43. 20:1,2. Ps. 5:9. 52:1,2. Prov. 18:20,21. [Pract. of Observations.]

Note.—Every kind, or nature, of living creatures, however monstrous, ravenous, fierce, or venomous, on the dry land, and in the ocean, has been, and is, in some instances subdued by the reason, courage, and persevering efforts, of the human species; by which means the mischiefs, which otherwise would have been occasioned by them, are in great measure prevented. But no man could ever find out a way to subdue the tongue; or to hinder wicked men from corrupting the principles, polluting the imaginations, and inflaming the passions of others, by their mischievous discourse. No one, however wise, powerful, or excellent, has ever been able, by laws, punishments, arguments, or any other method, to stop the progress of this evil; which effects far more tremendous desolations, in communities, churches, and families; and does far more to make men miserable, here and hereafter, than all the venomous and voracious creatures in the world, combined together can do.—The word, rendered tame, properly means subdue. It could scarcely be said that all kinds of sea-monsters, crocodiles, and serpents, had been tamed, or rendered tractable, by men: but they have all been brought under subjection, in one way or another: whereas no efforts could ever prevent the malignant effects of the unbridled tongues of ungodly men. For "the tongue is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison;" the chief instrument, by which the desperate wickedness of men's hearts is propagated, to poison the principles, and inflame the corrupt passions, of multitudes around them.—With the tongue, indeed, true Christians bless and praise God, according to the honorable use for which it was created; and many do this outwardly, who are destitute of true piety. Yet with this same member numbers slander, revile, anathematize, and imprecate vengeance on other men, from the malignity and pride of their hearts: though men were first created after the image of God, still retain his natural image, and are capable of being renewed to a conformity to his holiness! (Notes, Gen. 1:26,27. 9:5,6.) So that, out of the same mouth the language of love, gratitude, and adoration of God; and that of enmity and rancor against men proceed!—Some indeed may plead, that they thus express their indignation against opposers of the gospel, from zeal for the truth, and against error: but these things “ought by no means to be so;” and every Christian, who acts in such a manner, belies his profession, and yields to the suggestions of Satan, and to his own corrupt passions. Indeed, it is an absurdity, which cannot be paralleled in all nature: for no fountain from the same opening sends forth water, sometimes sweet, at others bitter, sometimes fresh, and at others salt: and every plant produces uniformly its natural fruit, and no other. But pious, pure, loving, candid, sincere, humble, and edifying language is the genuine produce of a sanctified heart; and none, who understand Christianity, would expect to hear curses, lies, boastings, and revilings from a believer’s mouth; any more than they would look for figs upon a vine, or olive-berries on a fig-tree. 14 But <sup>f</sup> if ye have bitter envying and strife in your hearts, <sup>g</sup> glory not, <sup>h</sup> and lie not against the truth.

Note.—The apostle had digressed from his subject, by showing the consequences of an assuming temper, and an improper desire to be “teachers;” but he here resumes it. If therefore any of those, into whose hands his epistle might come, were, or desired to be thought, persons of superior wisdom, understanding, and genius, and endowed with much knowledge of the gospel; let them not think themselves buried in a private or obscure station, or indulge a proud, aspiring, and discontented spirit; but let them “show forth,” by the general tenor “of a good conversation,” in the several relations and employments of life, “their works” of piety, equity, purity, and mercy, “in meekness of wisdom;” exercising that prudence, which is characterized by a meek and quiet spirit, and inseparably connected with it, and with a readiness to forgive and be at peace with all men. (Notes, 17, 18. 1:19—21. Matt. 5:5. 2 Tim. 2:23—26. Tit. 3:1—3.) But if any indulged “bitter envying,” or proud, fierce, and malevolent zeal, for their own party or sentiments, “in their hearts;” or so rivalled others for pre-eminence, reputation, or authority, as to censure, revile, and calumniate them, in a malignant manner, and to take pleasure in contending and quarrelling with such as differed from them; let them not absurdly glory in these hateful tempers and this ill behavior, as if they arose from a superior degree of holy zeal, boldness, or faithfulness: neither let them defame and “slander the truth,” by pleading that such were the necessary effects of embracing, professing, and earnestly defending it; or that those were “lukewarm;” who did not dispute for it in this violent manner. For “this wisdom,” though it might have injudicious admirers, even among apparently religious people, did not “descend from above;” (Notes, 1:5—8. 16—18.) but was “earthly,” as it sought earthly distinctions and advantages, and was of an earthly origin. It was also “sensual,” or natural, the result of such principles as unregenerate men are actuated by; and it was “devilish,” being at first derived from the devil, and constituting the image of his pride, ambition, policy, sagacity, envy, malignity, and falsehood. (Note, 1 Cor. 2:14—16.)—The word rendered sensual, is in the passage referred to translated natural: and I apprehend it should be so rendered in this place; for it seems rather to relate to man’s natural depravity in general; than to his sensuality in particular, to which ambitious disputants are commonly less addicted than to malignant passions.—The apostle added, that “where envying and strife” are found, “there is” of course “confusion, and every evil work:” for those passions, when given loose to by one man, are excited in others; till churches, communities, and families, are thrown into confusion, and all species of crimes are perpetrated; whilst men are blinded and hurried on by their violent resentments and prejudices.

Note.—In contradistinction to the carnal wisdom above described; (Notes, 13—16. 1:5—8. 1 Cor. 1:17—24. 2:6—9. 3:18—23.) "the wisdom which is from above," even that wisdom, which God gives to his people, in answer to their humble and believing prayers, "is first pure," in respect of its objects, motives, and tendency; it relates to the holy and purifying truths and precepts of scripture, and is derived from them and regulated by them: and it tends to holiness of heart, language, and conduct. As far as it can consist with this, and with steadily avowing the truths and obeying the commandments of God our Saviour, "this wisdom is peaceable:" the possessor of it is disposed to give up every thing for peace, except truth and duty; and these he will firmly adhere to, but in a peaceable and loving manner. It is also "gentle;" and influences men to be slow to anger, candid, calm, forbearing, and courteous. "It is easy to be entreated," and persuaded to what is reasonable, or forgiving; and to listen to the words of truth and equity, though spoken by an inferior, a child, or an enemy; and it is full of mercy, compassion, tenderness, and all "good fruits." (Note, Gal. 5:22—26.) This heavenly wisdom is also "without partiality," in judging of persons or actions: free from bigotry for one party, or against another; and from contending for one part of religion, to the neglect and disparagement of others; or producing that partiality to the rich, and that prejudice against the poor, which the apostle had before reprov'd. (Notes, 2:1—7.) Finally, it is free from "hypocrisy;" leading a man to regard the will and acceptance of God, far more than the good opinion of men of whatever rank or character.—Heavenly wisdom, according to St. James' description of it, is very nearly allied to that love, for which St. Paul contended: (Note, 1 Cor. 13:4—7.) and we may observe of both, that they are described, as they are in themselves; and that every man may ascertain the reality, or the degree, of his attainments in them, by their effects on his temper and conduct. For, whatever bigots and zealots may imagine, "the fruit of righteousness," or that good seed whence the blessed fruit of righteousness grows here on earth, "is sown in peace:" men of peaceable, loving tempers, preaching the gospel, or in any scriptural way endeavoring to make it known to mankind, adorning it in their lives, and watering it with their prayers, "sow the seed," which God blesses to the conversion of sinners, and the propagation of true religion in the world. It "is sown in peace," not amidst great noise and disturbance; and by those "who make peace," who are both peaceable and peace-makers, in the church and in the world. (Notes, 1:19—21. Matt. 5:9. Heb. 12:9—14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Did men duly weigh the importance and difficulty of the sacred ministry, the account which must be given of it, and the trials and temptations to which it must expose them; they would be less forward, than they sometimes are, in aspiring to that distinction. (Note, 1 Tim. 3:1.) Indeed, all conspicuous stations must be connected with many painful and mortifying circumstances, and have proportionable responsibility connected with them: so that numbers, who occupy or intrude into them, will receive the "heavier condemnation" on that account. If then, the glory of God, the good of mankind, and an evident call in Providence, did not require the contrary; a wise and humble man, possessed of much self-knowledge, and knowledge of human nature, and the state of the world and the church, would choose obscurity and privacy, to be out of the way of temptation, to shun the danger of dishonoring the gospel; and to escape trials, as much as this present state will admit of it. Yet alas! however stationed, "in many things we offend all:" for a well informed Christian will readily acknowledge, that his rule of duty is perfect; but he will also know, that in fact no man on earth lives up to it.—Nothing is more arduous than the proper government of the tongue: and the minister, who is satisfied that Christ has sent him to preach the gospel, will trust in his abundant mercy, and all-sufficient grace; but he will also perceive, that no outward appendages of his work can counterbalance the additional danger of contracting guilt, to which it exposes him. Facts abundantly prove, that more professed Christians succeed in bridling their senses and appetites, than in duly restraining their tongues: and whilst we contemplate, with grief and astonishment, the horrible effects produced by this "unruly evil," "this world of iniquity, this deadly poison, this fire that sets the whole course of nature" in a flame, in every part of the earth, and has done so through all the ages of time, and while we recollect with admiring gratitude and joy, that the Lord makes use of this very member, when he has filled the heart with holy affections, to spread the word of truth and righteousness throughout the earth; let us particularly inquire, what use we make of our tongues. It behoves us to "bridle them," that they may obey the dictates of our enlightened understandings and holy affections, as the well managed horse does the rider, or as the ship is turned by the helm in the hand of the pilot: that neither pride, passion, lust, nor levity, nor yet any temptation, may lead us to speak corrupt or unadvised words, or any thing contrary to the glory of God and the edification of men. As no man is able to subdue and tame the tongue, no, not his own tongue, without the help of divine grace: we are reminded to beg of God to do it for us: for the "things which are impossible with man, are possible with God." Depending on his grace, let us take heed "to bless, and not curse:" (Notes, Matt. 5:43—48. Rom. 12:14—16. 1 Pet. 3:8—12.) let us aim at a consistency of conversation and conduct, and to see to it that our love to men proves the sincerity of our professed love to God; and that our conduct, out of the places of worship, corresponds with our language and professions in it. For very many things are, even among Christians, that ought not to be so.

V. 13—18.

Instead of seeking the reputation of wisdom and knowledge, by ostentatiously aspiring after pre-eminence: let us be careful to "show out of a good conversation our works with meekness of wisdom;" avoiding all bitter "envyings, and zeal, and strife in our hearts," as well as in our words and actions; not glorying in such things as are indeed a shame to any man, or scandalizing the truth by disgraceful contentions about it, and slandering it by pleading that it calls for this bitter zeal. Such wisdom is common enough in the world, and in the visible church: and it thrives here, being in its proper soil and climate; for, "it descendeth not from above, but is earthly, natural, and devilish," producing "confusion" and distraction in families, communities, and religious societies; "and every evil work." May the Lord then bestow upon us the "wisdom, which is from above;" may the purity, peace, gentleness, docility, and mercy, manifested in all our actions; and "the fruits of righteousness" abounding in our lives, evince that God has replenished us with this most excellent gift! May we avoid all partiality, respect of persons, narrow prejudices, and a half religion, as well as hypocrisy; and in our words and works, be employed as peace-makers, to sow that good seed, which yields "the fruits of righteousness" on earth, to the glory of God and the salvation of men, and which best secures "the peaceable fruits of righteousness" to our own souls.

Note.—(Notes, 3:13—18.) The apostle is generally supposed to have, in this place, addressed the unconverted Jews; to the conduct of whom his language is peculiarly applicable, according to the history of those times. Indeed, we can scarcely conceive, that persons, continuing members of the Christian church, at so early a period, were guilty of the enormities here mentioned: though the passage, alas! is applicable enough to nominal Christians in subsequent ages. But the apostle seems to have cautioned his Christian brethren against envy, strife, and ambition, which gained ground within the church, by the example of the Jewish nation: and the still more tremendous effects, which sprang from the same causes among them. He, however, employed such language, as would be a direct and pointed address to those Jews, who might happen to read his epistle; when he said, "From whence come wars and fightings among you?" For it was evident, that "the nation was divided against itself," and split into parties, which destroyed each other by most furious contests; while their continual insurrections were drawing down destruction on them from the Roman power. Did not these calamities arise from their "lusts" or their pleasures? that is, from those corrupt passions which they sought their pleasure in gratifying? These lusts warred "in their members:" either in the members of the corrupt nature, the Old Adam, in which one lust warred against another, as all could not be gratified, and each strove for the mastery; or rather "by the members" of their bodies; which their carnal passions, working within, and overcoming the feeble resistance of reason and conscience, made use of as weapons, or "instruments of unrighteousness," for perpetrating their criminal purposes. (Notes, Rom. 6:12,13,16—19. 7:22—25.) They eagerly craved worldly prosperity, and the several indulgences connected with it; but they did not possess them: and, in consequence of this disappointment, they were ready to murder, or actually did murder, such persons as stood in their way; yet they could not, after all, obtain the advantages, which they so inordinately coveted. This, therefore, rendered them still more violent; and intestine discords and public insurrections were excited: but instead of prospering by them, they were the more impoverished and distressed, and reduced often almost to desperation; because they sought not the desired benefits from God by prayer. This seems to refer to the eager desires of the Jewish nation after temporal prosperity, and liberty from the Roman yoke; and to the violent and impious measures, which they adopted in order to obtain them: for these measures effected nothing, except the increase of their miseries; and they were hastening their own destruction, because they trusted not in God.—Some of them, however, it might be supposed, kept up the form of religion, and prayed for liberty from their oppressors, and for temporal prosperity; but they did not receive what they asked for, because they “asked amiss:” their very prayers were dictated by selfish and worldly affections; they were presented in a formal manner, and by those who continued to reject their Messiah, vainly expecting a temporal deliverer, whom they would gladly have welcomed. So that they asked for worldly advantages and possessions alone, and in order that they might spend and waste them in gratifying their passions. (Notes, Matt. 7:7—11. 20:20—23.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The Jews were still the professed worshippers of God, and the nation had been espoused to him by special covenant: idolatry, therefore, and other direct violations of the national covenant, were spiritual adultery; and the rejection and crucifixion of the Messiah was the grossest instance of that crime, which could be committed. They moreover idolized worldly interests and pleasures, in the most excessive manner: as if these had been their portion, and religion no farther valuable than as it subserved that primary object. It is also probable, that many nominal Christians had renounced, concealed, or belied, their profession, from regard to the world, to such a degree as to merit the severe rebuke contained in this address. Both descriptions might justly be called “adulterers and adulteresses,” in respect of their unfaithfulness to that God, whose professed worshippers they were; though perhaps not guilty of adultery, in the common acceptance of the word; as no doubt many of the Jews were. And did not they, to whom “the oracles of God were committed,” know “that the friendship of the world was enmity with God?” This was so evidently the case, that if any man, resolved to live on friendly terms with the world, he must be “the enemy of God.” The world, or mankind in general, being under the influence of Satan, and consequently governed by unholy maxims, the result of a carnal judgment and disposition; he, who will, at any rate, be on terms with the world, must not profess the truth, attend on the ordinances, or keep the commandments of God; above all, he must not be zealous for the honor, cause, and gospel of Christ, in that manner and measure, to which every believer is bound, and in fact disposed. (Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. 4:3—12. Matt. 10:21—26. John 7:3—10. 8:41—47. 15:17—21. 17:13—16. Rom. 8:5—9. Eph. 2:1—3. 1 John 3:11—15. 4:4—6. 5:19.) “The friendship of the world” implies also an intimate alliance with the determined enemies of God, which no man can maintain, without habitual rebellion against him to please his enemies. (Note, 2 Cor. 6:14—18.) To live in friendship therefore with the world denotes, that a man is carnally-minded, at enmity with God, unregenerate, unpardoned, and unreconciled; whatever his notions, convictions, or profession, have been and are. This must be the case, till Satan, “the god and prince of this world,” is “dethroned,” and mankind in general become true Christians. The servants of Christ are indeed friends to the world, or to men in general; and desirous in every way of doing them good, far beyond what any other persons are: but they cannot possess “the friendship of the world” in any measure, without acting contrary to the spirit and rules of their profession. Did then the Jews, or the inconsistent professors of Christianity, suppose, that the scripture spake in vain, without truth or meaning, in all those numerous passages, which describe the ungodliness, selfishness, carnality, pride, and malignity of the human heart, and declare that “the spirit, which” naturally “dwelleth in us lusteth to envy,” or enviously? For it was evident from the whole tenor of the Old Testament, that the natural disposition of fallen man, as instigated by Satan, so eagerly covets worldly things, as to envy all those who possess them, and thus prompts to ambition, contention, hatred, fraud, injustice; and that it leads them to envy, or to hate, those who love God, as Cain envied, hated, and murdered his brother Abel. Must not then such persons be enemies to God, his truths, ways, cause, and people? Could they hope to reconcile “the friendship of <sup>o</sup>” so wicked a world, with that of God? Or would they deem themselves his people, whilst evidently under the power of this envious spirit?—Some expositors, not finding any text in the Old Testament expressly declaring, that "the spirit which is in us lusteth to envy;" and not satisfied with the general tenor of the scripture on that point, read the last clause as a separate interrogation: "Do ye think, that the scripture speaketh in vain" against this worldly mindedness? or, "doth the Spirit, which dwelleth in us, lust to envy?" That is, does the Holy Spirit, which dwelleth in all Christians, or that new nature which he creates, produce such fruit? (Note, Gal. 5:22-26.) The meaning is nearly the same: but the first seems the true interpretation.—The apostle would further remind his readers, that "God giveth" his people "more grace," than to leave them slaves to such vile passions: and, having begun to sanctify their hearts; he gives them more and more of the transforming influences of his Holy Spirit, to deliver them gradually from every evil temper, and to make them spiritual in all their affections and dispositions. So that, while he fights against the proud, the self-sufficient, the ambitious, the scornful and obstinate, the self-willed, the impenitent, and unbelieving; he shows favor and communicates grace, to the humble and lowly, who are supplicants for spiritual blessings at his mercy-seat. (Marg. Ref. p. q.—Notes, Prov. 3:34. Luke 1:46-55. 14:7-11. 18:9-13. 1 Pet. 5:5-7.)—The apostle quotes the Septuagint, except as  $\delta$  Θεος, GOD, is substituted for Κεκοτος, the LORD. The Hebrew reads "he scorneth the scorners:" but the scorners are the proud, and the Lord resists those whom he scorns. (Note, Ps. 2:4-6.)

* Resist the devil, and he will flee from you.

10 <sup>b</sup> Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and <sup>c</sup> he shall lift you up.

Note.—From the preceding reproofs and arguments, the apostle took occasion to exhort the unconverted Jews, or nominal Christians, who should read his epistle, to "submit themselves to God." For he would certainly fight against the proud, as his peculiar enemies and competitors, till they were either brought to "submit" to him, or were destroyed: and, as he was ever "waiting to be gracious" to the humble supplicant. Let them then be persuaded to submit to his teaching and authority, to own the justice of his judgments and threatenings, to plead guilty and cast themselves upon his mercy, to resign themselves to his will, and to obey him as his willing subjects. In order to this, it behoved them to "resist the devil," and to reject his suggestions; whether immediate or by his agents, which tended to excite their sinful passions, or to prejudice them against the holy salvation and service of God: for if they resisted the tempter resolutely, in dependence on divine grace; and opposed to his suggestions the plain truths, promises, instructions, and precepts of scripture; he would be driven from them, by the power of the Lord, and "flee" away as a vanquished enemy. (Notes, Matt. 4:3-11. P. O. 1-11. Notes, Eph. 4:26,27. 6:10-20. 1 Pet. 5:8,9.) Let them also "draw near to God," as in Christ Jesus, and upon a mercy-seat, by the prayer of faith, seeking reconciliation to him; and he would "draw nigh to them," to support, sanctify, comfort, and bless them. (Notes, Ps. 65:2. 73:23-28. Is. 55:6,7. Hos. 6:1-3. 14:1-3. Heb. 7:23-25.) But at the same time, they, who were living ungodly and wickedly, or practising any kind of sin, must "cleanse their hands" from it, by repenting of it, forsaking it with abhorrence, and renouncing all the worldly pleasure or profit connected with it. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. 1:10-20. Ez. 18:30-32. Matt. 12:33-37. Heb. 10:19-22.) "The double-minded," likewise, who were disposed to divide their hearts between God and Mammon; (Note, 1:5-8.) the men, who cleaved to the world and its friendship and interests, must "purify their hearts," in dependence on the mercy and grace of the gospel, from every pollution, that they might be prepared, in the fear and love of God, and by all holy affections, for a life of humble and devoted obedience. Instead therefore of proceeding in a thoughtless course of sin, or a formal and unfruitful profession of Christianity; "let them be afflicted, and mourn, and weep," on account of the dishonor which their sins had done to God, the mischief which they had occasioned to men, and the danger to which their own souls were exposed; and because of the rebellious ingratitude, contempt, and enmity, of which they had been guilty, especially in their opposition to Christ and his salvation. (Marg. Ref. z, a.—Notes, 5:1-6. Matt. 5:4. Luke 6:24-26. 23:26-31.) Their vain mirth and "laughter," as well as their scornful derision of divine things, ought without delay, to be "turned into mourning" and "godly sorrow;" and their worldly joy into "heaviness," depression of spirits, self-abasement, brokenness of heart, and serious concern for their souls. For, if they humbled themselves inwardly, and in the sight of God, by unfeigned repentance, submission to his righteousness, and acceptance of his salvation; he would certainly lift them up from their dejection, heal their wounded spirits, comfort them with his reconciled love, exalt them to most valuable privileges, and enrich them with everlasting glory and felicity; as well as exempt them from the miseries, which were about to come on the nation.

12 There is one <sup>h</sup> Lawgiver, who is <sup>i</sup> able to save and to destroy: <sup>k</sup> who art thou that judgest another?

Note.—The apostle next warned his brethren, or those who professed and appeared to be Christians, to avoid detraction, slander, and uncharitable judgments on each other's motives, actions, characters, or state. (Notes, Matt. 7: 1—5. Luke 6:37—40.) These things were expressly forbidden in the divine law; (Notes, Ex. 20:16. Lev. 19:16,18.) so that the man, who thus reviled, slandered, or decided against his brethren, did in fact slander, judge, and condemn the law itself; as if it were unjust, unnecessary, or unfit to be obeyed. This conduct, therefore, was indeed no less a presumption, than for a man to quit his station as God's subject, who ought to be "a doer of the law;" (Note, 1:22—25.) and to usurp the place of a law-giver and judge, whose office it was to determine what ought to be commanded, to prescribe to men their conduct, to call them to account for it, and to pass sentence upon the guilty. But there was "one Lawgiver," who was fully authorized, and qualified, to enact laws, for his church, and for the universe, to enforce them, and to vindicate their obligation and honor; being "able to destroy" the obstinate transgressor, and to detect the masked hypocrite, as well as "to save" the humble penitent: and to him all authority and judgment belonged. Who then was the poor worm, the wretched sinner, that, forgetful of his own deserts, dared to usurp the throne of judgment, as if he were the competitor of Christ; and to decide on the actions, and denounce sentence against the persons of his brethren, in a dictatorial manner; and according to his own rules, as if that were his province and duty? Nothing can more completely demonstrate any proposition, than this passage demonstrates, that the moral law is the believer's rule of duty; and that every word or action, which dishonors the law of God, is rebellion, if not blasphemy, against our one Lawgiver and Judge. At the same time, it exposes in a most striking manner, the wickedness of that presumptuous, rash, and censorious way, in which zealots and bigots condemn and anathematize those, who in any respect differ from them; to the immense scandal of the gospel and disturbance of the church: and this conduct in fact is almost always found to accompany antinomian tenets, and is perfectly congenial to them; though not confined to those who adopt them.—The coincidence of St. James' exhortation, with that of the apostle of the Gentiles, in the fourteenth chapter of his Epistle to the Romans, is well worthy of our special notice: for it is generally supposed, that St. James here refers to the same subject; namely, the difference of opinion and conduct between the Jewish and Gentile converts, concerning meats and days, and the other ceremonies of the law. (Note, Rom. 14:1—12.)

13 <sup>l</sup> Go to now, ye that say, <sup>m</sup> To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, <sup>n</sup> and buy and sell, and get gain:

14 Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? * It is even <sup>o</sup> a vapor, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away.

15 For that ye ought to say, <sup>p</sup> If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that.

16 But now <sup>q</sup> ye rejoice in your boasting: all such rejoicing is evil.

17 Therefore to him that <sup>r</sup> knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin.

Note.—The apostle next proceeds to reprove and expose the self-sufficiency, worldly spirit, and unbelieving irreligious language, which were manifested by many in another way. The expression, "Go to now," or "Come now," here implied strong disapprobation, and a call to any one to consider the absurdity, or ungodliness, of his conduct. (Marg. Ref. l.) The persons reprov'd were eager in pursuing worldly advantages, pleased with the sagacious plans which they had formed for obtaining them, and sanguine in expecting success: but they neither considered the shortness and uncertainty of life, nor their entire dependence on God in every thing. Thus some would say, "We shall set out to-day, or to-morrow, and 'go to such a city, where we purpose to reside for a year, and by carrying on such or such a trade, we 'expect to enrich ourselves.' Whereas, they could not know what might take place respecting them, even on the morrow, or for a single day. (Notes, Prov. 27:1. Is. 56:9—12. Luke 12: 13—21.) For indeed, "what were their lives?" to be compared unto, but a vapor, or luminous meteor, which, gliding through the air in the night, may perhaps appear beautiful for a moment, but then vanishes for ever? So short, unreal, unsubstantial, uncertain, and fading was human life, and all the splendor, prosperity, or enjoyments which attended on it; though an eternity of bliss or wo, to each of them,

(Notes, Luke 12:47,48. John 13:12—17.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

All the wars, murders, massacres, persecutions, oppressions, and bloody contests, which ever desolated the earth, or harassed the church, from the beginning to this day, have originated “from the lusts” of man’s apostate nature, and the perverse pleasure which he takes in breaking the commandments of God. The carnal affections of the heart, having cast off the rule of reason and wisdom, anarchy and civil war takes place in the soul; while one member of the corrupt nature wars against the rest, and they in turns prevail and are gratified; and while the members of the body are the instruments of their pernicious purposes, and obey the dictates of the tyrant of the hour.—This being, in one way or another, the case, with the unnumbered millions of the human species, (except the remnant who are “born again,”) we need not wonder at the confusion, crimes, and miseries, which have, in every age, abounded in all parts of the world; though we ought deeply to mourn over them.—But satisfaction cannot be found in ungodliness, whatever method the carnal mind may select in order to obtain it. In respect of spiritual and eternal blessings, it may be said of very many, “Ye have them not because ye ask not,” or “because ye ask amiss;” yet all who ask in sincerity will surely receive; and the humble “prayer of faith” is the best means of obtaining all desirable success in temporal things. But if men ask worldly prosperity and affluence, that they may gratify their lusts, and waste the bounty of God in violating his commandments; they pray wickedly, and their requests will either be rejected, or they will receive the things, for which they prayed, as a scourge, or a curse.—Alas! how many nominal Christians might be addressed in the apostle’s words, “as adulterers and adulteresses,” both literally and spiritually! And yet, how would they be disgusted and enraged, if a minister were to accost them in such language, however justly and scripturally applied! But, in whatever terms the offensive truth be conveyed, we are bound to declare, most perspicuously, that “the friendship of the world is enmity against God; and that whosoever willetth and purposeth to be the friend of the world, he is the enemy of God.” Such a profession of the gospel, as gives no offence to a “world that lieth in wickedness,” will leave a man to perish with the enemies of Christ. Let us then endeavor to be friends to mankind, and to do good to all men; and, at the same time, to disregard the friendship or enmity of the world, to refuse conformity to its vain fashions, (Note, Rom. 12:2.) to separate from the intimate society of ungodly men, and to profess the truths and obey the precepts of Christ; not inquiring how far we may do it without incurring reproach, contempt, opprobrious names, or other kinds and degrees of persecution.—The envious, ambitious, aspiring spirit of ungodly men is totally contrary to the Christian temper, and the influences of the Holy Spirit: and “if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.”—The Lord gives grace to his people; though he often denies them wealth and honor; (Note, Ps. 84:11,12.) and he will “give more grace” to those who long to have all sin mortified, and their hearts completely sanctified: but “he resisteth the proud,” as his rivals and personal enemies: while he communicates the blessings of his special favor and grace, exclusively to the “poor in spirit” and “the broken in heart.” (Notes, Is. 57:15,16, 20,21. 66:1,2. Matt. 5:3.)

V. 7—17.

If any of our fallen race desire to be happy here and hereafter, let them “submit themselves to God;” unreservedly, and in all respects; to his teaching as little children; to his righteousness as condemned criminals, casting themselves wholly on his mercy in Christ Jesus; to his authority and commands; and to all his providential dispensations concerning them. Thus let them seek his grace and favor; let them “resist the devil” and reject his temptations, “and he shall flee from them;” and let them “draw near to God” upon his mercy-seat, and he will draw near to save and help them. But repentance must be shown “by works meet for repentance;” the sinner, who comes to God, must “cleanse his hands” from the allowed practice of every transgression, however secret, gainful, or pleasant to corrupt nature: and “the double-minded” must cleanse his heart from hypocrisy, partiality, and worldly lusts; earnestly calling upon God to enable him for these things, which would otherwise be entirely impracticable. All sin must be wept over and lamented; either here in “godly sorrow,” or hereafter in "wailing and gnashing of teeth." (Notes, Ec. 11:7—10. Matt. 8:10—12. 2 Cor. 7:9—11. Heb. 12:15—17.) Men may defer this inseparable consequence of wickedness, but they cannot escape it. Well may we then call on the gay triflers around us, to "be afflicted, and mourn, and weep;" as well as on the haughty and presumptuous, "to humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt them in due time:" for this is the only road to everlasting honor and felicity; nor will the Lord, on any account, fail to comfort every penitent mourner for sin, or to exalt one who abases himself before him.—But, while ministers and Christians, in their several places, protest against ungodliness, impenitence, pride, unbelief, and all iniquity; they should carefully avoid calumniating, reviling, and judging others; or deciding either on their state or conduct; except when their duty to them or to others renders it unavoidable. Alas! there are too many professed Christians, who seem openly to quit the place of the servants of God, and doers of his commandments, to set up for judges, and to prescribe to their fellow-servants, or decide on their eternal state. Such men speak evil of the divine law, and defame it; while they vent their own passions, under the color of zeal for the truths of the gospel. But let us leave them, and all others, to their own Master, remembering that "there is one Lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy;" and let us be careful to judge ourselves, that we may not be condemned by him.—(Notes, Rom. 14:10—12. 1 Cor. 11:29—34.) Let us also watch against the worldly spirit and conduct, so common among professors of the gospel, who scheme, purpose, and speak, as if they were to live here for ever, as if this were their rest and portion, and as if "God were not in all their thoughts." Let us remember, that "our life is but a vapor, that continueth a little while and then passeth away," just when and as the Lord pleaseth; and the world is full of vexation and disappointment; and that we have nothing to do on earth, but to secure the salvation of our souls, to glorify God, and to "serve our generation." Then we shall cordially say, "If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that;" and keep at a distance from the self-conceited and foolish boastings of ungodly men.—Let us learn also to reduce all our knowledge to practice; remembering, that in all things, "to him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin," heinous and aggravated sin; and that omitting known duty is as criminal as committing known sin.

Note.—The apostle here evidently meant a direct address to the unbelieving Jews, among whom the rich and great men of the nation in general were found. He wrote only a short time before the destruction of Jerusalem; even before those tremendous desolations, which Christ had predicted, and his disciples expected; (Notes, Matt. 24: Mark 13: Luke 21:) And as many of the more prosperous of his countrymen rejected the gospel, from regard to their worldly interests, and were become most atrociously wicked, he foresaw the speedy termination of all their enjoyments, and the most tremendous temporal calamities about to overwhelm them; as well as the event of their crimes in future misery, if they continued to the end unbelieving and impenitent. He therefore called on them, to come and attend to his words, and to consider the danger of their condition: that they might "weep and howl" with most doleful lamentations, on account of the complicated miseries which were even then coming upon them. (Marg. Ref. c.—Note, 4:7—10.) As to their treasures, they "would not at all profit them in the day of the LORD's vengeance." (Marg. Ref. d—h.—Notes, Is. 2: 19—21. Matt. 6:19—21.) Their corn, and other perishable goods, which they had avariciously hoarded, were corrupted; or they would be of no more use to them, than if they were entirely decayed. Their costly garments, which they kept in splendid wardrobes, were consuming by moths; and indeed such a curse lay upon them, that they would soon be of no value. Nay, even their gold and silver, which should have been brightened by circulation, were laid by, till they were tarnished, as with rust, and the very appearance of their money would bear witness against their covetousness: whilst, in consequence of heaping it up, their enemies would have the richer plunder. The anguish also, of having it torn from them, would be a torment to their minds; and their guilty consciences would upbraid them with the crimes by which they became rich, and the bad use which they had made of their abundance: so that they would be tortured, as if the rust of their metals were converted into a caustic, to burn their flesh like fire. (Notes, Mic. 6:10—15. Hab. 2:9—11.) Indeed, with much wickedness and great labor, they had amassed treasures, for "the last days" of their city and nation, when God was about to execute tremendous vengeance upon them, for their personal and public iniquities; and when riches would no more profit them at the crisis, than 'in the hour of death, and at the day of judgment;' so that in fact they had "treasured up wrath against the day of wrath." (Note, Rom. 2:4—6.) For, behold, "the hire of their laborers," who had reaped their harvest, and toiled to increase their wealth, had been fraudulently withholden, and it cried for vengeance from heaven upon them! (Notes, Lev. 19:13. Deut. 24:14,15. Job 24:2—12. 31:33—40. Jer. 22:13—19.) So that the bitter and loud complaints of the oppressed, against their cruel tyrants, were heard by "the Lord of sabaoth," or, of armies, who was about to send the Roman armies to execute his judgments on them for their iniquity. (Matt. 22:7.) They had indeed lived, for a time, luxuriously and delicately, and had rioted in sensuality, as cattle in a rich pasture; and the pride and sensuality of their hearts had been nourished by prosperity and self-indulgence, "as in a day of slaughter," when many sacrifices were offered and a great feast was made; or rather, as the ox is fattened for the day of slaughter, and enjoys his luxuriant pasture securely to that very time.—But, above all their other crimes, the Jews had iniquitously condemned and crucified, with the suffrage, as it were, of the whole nation, that "Just One" who had come among them, even "Jesus Christ the righteous;" and they still perpetuated that enormous crime, by persecuting his meek and harmless followers. Hitherto he had not resisted them, but had meekly and patiently endured their injuries; and they had no pretence for their outrageous enmity and cruelty to him and his disciples. But he was about to come, and to execute most terrible vengeance upon them.

Note.—After the preceding awful warning and sharp reproof of the wealthy Jews, who were the principal opposers of the gospel, and peculiarly exposed to the approaching judgments of God; the apostle addressed himself to his poor, afflicted, and persecuted fellow Christians; whom he exhorted to bear their sufferings, with resignation and constant perseverance, till "the coming of the Lord." He primarily meant the providential coming of the Lord Jesus, to deliver them from the persecution of the Jewish rulers, and to execute vengeance upon that devoted nation: yet he intended, no doubt, to lead their thoughts forward to the hour of death, and the coming of Christ to judgment. (Notes, Matt. 24:25.)—They could not but observe, that "the husbandman," when he has tilled his ground, and sown the seed, with great labor and expense, does not reap the harvest immediately; but waits patiently, for some months, amidst the fluctuations of the weather, and continually adds further labor, as occasion requires; till the Lord, on whom the increase entirely depends, is pleased to "send the former and the latter rain:" (Marg. Ref. x.—Note, Joel 2:21—24.) and at length the crop ripens, and his toil and waiting are amply compensated by the harvest. (Notes, Mark 4:26—29. John 4:31—38. Gal. 6:6—10. 2 Tim. 2:3—7.) Thus ought they to wait, with patient hope and persevering diligence, not yielding to weariness or desponding fears; but "stablishing their hearts" by faith in the promises of God, against all temptations to draw back, or to turn aside. For the time of their waiting would not be long; as in every sense "the coming of the Lord approached," and a most glorious and precious harvest would soon amply repay all their losses, hardships, and sufferings.

11 Behold, <sup>g</sup> we count them happy which endure. <sup>h</sup> Ye have heard of the patience of Job, <sup>i</sup> and have seen the end of the Lord; that <sup>k</sup> the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—It would also be wholly inconsistent for the Christians to grudge one another the transient advantages which some possessed and others did not; or to give way to envy, discontent, repinings, or resentment; lest "the coming of the Lord" should prove their condemnation, instead of their redemption. For they must carefully observe, that "the Judge" even then, as it were, "stood before the door," and was about to enter. Very soon would he decide between his true people, and hypocritical professors of Christianity, as well as execute vengeance on their avowed enemies: and they ought to prepare for his coming, and leave him to plead their cause, without attempting to avenge themselves; without groaning under injuries and distresses, or murmuring for want of such transient benefits, as all worldly possessions must be. Instead therefore of copying the fierce passions of their unbelieving countrymen, who were ready to rage under their calamities "like a wild bull in a net;" they ought to study and imitate the example of the ancient prophets, by whom the Lord had sent his word to their nation, and who had been injuriously treated, reviled, and even put to death for their faithfulness: yet they had persevered with calm confidence in God and submission to his will, and, with a meek and compassionate fortitude, among their enemies. They ought also to remember, that the apostles of Christ, and other faithful ministers of the New Testament, and all experienced Christians, "counted those happy, who" patiently "endured" affliction and persecution; not such as were exempted from suffering, or turned aside to avoid it. (Notes, 1:2—4,12. Matt. 10:21,22. Rom. 2:7—11. 5:3—5. Heb. 6:13—15. 10:35—39. 12:2—8.) They had often "heard of the patience of Job," under the most complicated and aggravated distresses which could be imagined; and how he steadfastly adhered to God, and determined to hope in him in his utmost extremity, not withstanding the excessive confusion into which his temptations had thrown his mind. And they perceived, that the end of his afflictions, and the temporal and spiritual advantages which he derived from them, sufficiently demonstrated that the Lord was most tenderly compassionate and propense to mercy, even when he most heavily afflicted, or sharply tried, his believing servants. (Marg. Ref. h, i.—Notes, Job 1:2:42:.) This had not appeared, during Job's calamities; but it was manifest in the event of them: and they also would find the same in the event of their trials; provided, they endured them patiently, and persevered in faith and obedience.

Grudge. (9) Στενάζετε. Mark 7:34. Rom. 8:23. 2 Cor. 5:2. Heb. 13:17.—The temptation to envy the prosperity of their oppressors, to murmur under their own sufferings, and to allow a spirit of resentment against their enemies, seems especially meant. (Notes, Ps. 73:.) —We count happy. (11) Μαχαρίζομεν. Luke 1:48.

Note.—"Above all things," the apostle called on those whom he addressed, to beware, lest their trials and provocations should lead them to swear, in a passionate, rash, or profane manner; in their own justification and to escape persecution; or by any customary oath, according to the general custom of the Jews, but in direct opposition to the express command of Christ. On the contrary, in their ordinary conversation, and at all times, when a solemn appeal to God as an act of religious worship was not proper, they ought simply to affirm, or deny, and to establish their assertion or engagement, by a serious repetition of it when necessary. Or rather, their veracity and punctuality ought to be so well known and fully approved, that every one might be ready to credit them, and confide in them, without hesitation, or requiring the security of an oath: otherwise they would "fall into condemnation," for swearing falsely, without necessity, or without due reverence of God or of an oath.—It is recorded, that the Jews were remarkably guilty of common swearing, at this time; which might induce the apostle to enter this solemn protest against it. (Notes, Ex. 20:7. Matt. 5:33—37. 23:16—22. 2 Cor. 1:17—20,23,24.)—"It was 'a proverbial manner, among the Jews,... of 'characterizing a man of strict probity and good 'faith, by saying, His yes is yes, and his no is 'no: that is, you may depend on his word; as 'he declares, so it is; and as he promises, so he 'will do.' Campbell. 'We ought never to swear; 'but to be so universally observant of truth in 'our conversation, that our word may always 'be regarded as an oath.' Philo in Campbell.

Note.—Whilst worldly men, under their afflictions, either yielded to bitter complaints and desponding murmurs, or sought relief in sensual indulgence, or tried to extricate themselves by sinful means; Christians should be excited by their sorrows, to pray more frequently, copiously, and earnestly; that they might receive from God comfort, deliverance, and a sanctified use of their afflictions. On the other hand, when any of them prospered, or was cheerful in spirit; they ought to express their joy in the voice of praise and thanksgiving, and by singing the psalms, which inspired men had written for that use; or such songs of praise, as they or other Christians had composed for similar purposes, instead of running into the excesses of carnal rejoicing, or singing those frivolous, polluting, or profane songs and odes, which were used by ungodly men, when exhilarated, and desirous of expressing their joy and mirth. (Notes, Acts 16:25—28. Eph. 5:15—20. Phil. 4:4—7. Col. 3:16,17.)

Is any merry? Εὐθυμεῖ τις; Acts 27:22,25.

14 Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, <sup>u</sup> anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord.

15 And <sup>x</sup> the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and <sup>y</sup> if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him.

Note.—Sick persons were next directed by the apostle, to send for “the elders of the church,” many of whom were at that time endued with miraculous powers; that “they might pray for” their forgiveness and recovery, “anointing them with oil in the name of the Lord Jesus,” as expecting a cure from his power and love. And when this was done in that faith by which miracles were wrought; (Notes, Matt. 21:21,22. Mark 11:22—26. 1 Cor. 13:1—3.) the prayer, offered in behalf of the sick person, would be the means of saving his life; and the sins committed by him, for which the chastening was sent, would be pardoned. (Notes, Mark 6:13. 16:17,18. 1 Cor. 11:29—34.)—As miraculous cures are not now expected, the symbolical action of “anointing with oil” cannot properly be retained.—It need scarcely be observed, that the extreme unction, used by the church of Rome, totally differs from the anointing recommended by St. James; for that is never administered, till the sick person is supposed to be at the point of death, and no hope is entertained of his recovery: so that a spiritual benefit alone can be proposed by the ceremony; which on the contrary serves merely as an opiate, to quiet and stupify the consciences, both of the dying, and of the living.—It cannot be supposed, that these miraculous cures could be performed at all times: but there seems to have been some impression on the mind of the person, who wrought the miracle, and a peculiar exercise of faith in Christ for that purpose. But it might be proper for Christians, always when they were sick, to send for their pastors, to counsel and pray for them: though the visiting of the sick, by ministers exclusively, is not particularly spoken of in scripture, as it might have been expected that it would. When indeed this charitable service is performed with prudence, tenderness, and faithfulness, it may be very useful, especially to believers, and to those around them: but the indiscriminate visiting, praying in the same words for persons of all characters; and giving the Lord’s supper to sick and dying persons, without particular and appropriate instructions and exhortations, as it is too commonly managed, is doubtless of extremely bad tendency, and a relic of popish superstition and formality. For it not only gives a false quiet to many of those, who have then first begun to think about God and their souls: but it encourages others to procrastinate, under a delusive imagination, that a confession, a prayer, a ministerial absolution, and the sacrament, will set all right at last; without any previous diligence in the duties of a godly life. On the other hand, if nothing but a miraculous cure was sought, there could be no sufficient reason, why “the elders of the church,” rather than others, who were endued with miraculous gifts, should be sent for. The plural number is used; and, where it could be obtained, the presence of more than one minister would be desirable: but it cannot be supposed, that this was indispensably necessary.—That any difficulty should be found, about the persons intended by “the elders of the church,” would have been inconceivable to the author, had he never read any thing on the subject, except the New Testament: but some have supposed that the apostles themselves are meant!

Note.—The apostle next exhorted Christians to “confess their faults to one another.” This may mean, either mutual acknowledgment of the faults, into which they had fallen, in their conduct towards one another, which would tend greatly to peace and brotherly love, if duly practised; or a communication, reciprocally, of their conflicts and experience, and failures, with a candid confession of those things which burdened their consciences. This, when prudently managed, would make way for them to counsel, encourage, and exhort one another; and be a direction to their prayers for each other: thus promoting their inward peace, and the healing of their souls, as well as the removal of the chastisements which they had incurred. (Marg. Ref. z.)—Such a confession of faults one to another, does not in any respect resemble the practice, which the church of Rome has absurdly grounded upon it, of the laity being required to confess all their secret sins to the priests, in order to their being pardoned and absolved. For thus, that order of men, who are in themselves no less ambitious, interested, and prone to vice, than other orders in the society, is put in possession of the secrets of families, nay, of councils and princes, of which they have made abundant use, to their own aggrandizement, to the enslaving of the laity, and for many other most mischievous purposes. Thus also they discover the weak and vulnerable side of almost every individual; which opens the way to their attempting and committing crimes of every kind. But “the confession of faults,” spoken of by the apostle, is no more that of a layman to a priest, than that of a priest to a layman: it is reciprocal between Christians; and voluntary, that it may be regulated according to prudence and propriety, for the benefit of mutual exhortations and prayers.—To encourage his brethren to this beneficial practice, the apostle showed them the value and efficacy of prayer. When “a righteous person,” a true believer, justified in Christ, and, by his grace, walking before God in holy obedience, presented an effectual fervent prayer;—that is, one wrought in his heart by the energy of the Holy Spirit, exciting holy affections and believing expectations, and so leading him to be fervent and earnest in pleading the promises of God at his mercy-seat, in behalf of himself or others;—it “availed much,” in obtaining the blessings thus sought, being the means through which God was pleased to work his own gracious purposes, as really as any other which he employed for that end. Thus Elias, or Elijah, was a man of the same frail and fallen nature with others: and he was no more exempt from human infirmities, while he executed his ministry, than the apostle and his brethren were, though by a special favor he was exempted from death. (Note, Acts 14:11—13.) Yet he prayed, (under the influence of the prophetic Spirit, out of zeal for the glory of God, and to prevent the total apostacy and idolatry of Israel,) “that it might not rain on the land,” and in answer to his prayer, there was no rain for “three years and a half:” and at length, the calamity was terminated, in answer to his prayers for rain, after he had slain the priests of Baal. (Notes, 1 Kings 17: 1. 18:41—46. Luke 4:23—32.) This example seems rather to favor the opinion of those, who supposed the apostle to refer to “the prayer of faith,” as it respected miraculous interpositions: but the efficacy of that prayer, which is, in all ages, presented under the teaching and influences of the Holy Spirit, is throughout the scripture so fully declared, that this exclusive interpretation is here inadmissible.

Effectual fervent. (16) Ενεργουμένη. 1 Cor. 12:6,11. Eph. 1:11. 2:2. 3:20. Phil. 2:13. It may be understood either actively, (as the middle voice,) or passively. Actively, it signifies efficacious, effectual; but this seems a mere tautology, being equivalent to availeth: or, it means energetic, implying the earnestness and fervency employed. Passively, it denotes the energy by which the Holy Spirit prepares the heart for genuine prayer. (Notes, Ps. 10:17, 18. Rom. 8:24—27.) “The earnest prayer of ‘a righteous man, the effect of good affections ‘wrought in his heart by the energy of the ‘Holy Spirit, is of great efficacy.’ Doddridge.—He prayed earnestly. (17) Ηγορευθη προσηύξατο. 19 Brethren, if any of you do <sup>k</sup> err from the truth, <sup>l</sup> and one convert him;

Note.—Among other important works of love, which believers ought to attempt by faith and prayer; the recovery of such professed Christians, as had run into dangerous heresies, or fallen into sin, was peculiarly to be attended to: especially as many evils of this kind had taken place among them. (Notes, Gal. 6:1—5. Jude 22—25.) If any one, therefore, had turned aside “from the truth” of the gospel; and had gone into some destructive path; and one of his brethren was instrumental to his conversion, so that he was at length established as a true believer; he ought to consider himself, as under immensely greater obligations to the person who thus restored him, than if he had wrought a miracle to heal his sickness, or exposed himself to preserve his life. And the man, who had been employed in this good work, ought to deem it a far more desirable service, than if he had been enabled to work miracles for the recovery of the sick: seeing he had been employed by the Lord, in saving an immortal soul from eternal destruction, and of bringing a perishing transgressor to Christ; that his atoning blood might “cover the multitude of his sins,” never more to appear in judgment against him, or to prevent his admission into eternal happiness.—Neither this, nor any other good work, could “cover the multitude of sins,” which had been committed by the man who performed it, by inducing God to pardon him for the sake of it: for the most successful minister needs self-denying diligence, lest, "after having preached to others, he himself should be a cast-away;" (Note, 1 Cor. 9:24—27.) and the whole plan of the gospel runs counter to such an idea.—Surely it cannot be the apostle's intention to tell us, that the turning of a sinner from the error of his way will conceal, from the eye of God's justice, a multitude of sins committed by the person, who does this charitable action, if he continueth in them. "Such a person needs himself to be turned "from the error of his way," in order that his own soul may be saved from death." Macknight. In no sense or way can it be said, that our good works, of whatever kind, "cover the multitude of our sins," or any of our sins; without either implying, that they purchase for us an indulgence, or dispensation, to continue in sin; or that they are efficacious in atoning for sin, either alone, or along with the blood of Christ; or that by them we become interested in his redemption and righteousness, and not by faith only. The words referred to, (for it cannot be called a quotation, the word charity, or love, being omitted,) are found in the Proverbs, in the Hebrew, not the Septuagint. The context there evidently excludes this interpretation, and the use, afterwards made of them by St. Peter, by no means favors it. (Notes, Prov. 10:12. 1 Pet. 4:8.)—"He shall save a soul from eternal death; and shall be the means that the many sins of that convert shall, through his true repentance, be forgiven and not imputed to him." Bp. Hall.—The zeal and diligence thus shown might indeed be an evidence of grace, and conduce to a man's enjoying the comfort of the pardoning love of Christ, under chastenings and sorrows notwithstanding his manifold defects: (Note, Ps. 41:1—3.) yet this falls vastly short of the energy of the apostle's words, and seems not at all to have been in his thoughts; so that many learned men have labored in vain to put this construction upon them.—As "there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth;" zealous Christians cannot want any inducement of this kind, to animate them in attempting so blessed a service, when they have any prospect of success. (Notes, Luke 15:1—10.) Nor can they need any of their own works to "cover the multitude of their sins," who know the all-sufficiency of the Saviour's atoning blood. But the apostle meant to show his brethren, that this was a far more important usefulness, than even healing the sick by miracle: though nature would prompt them most to covet or value miraculous powers; and they might be led to overlook, or neglect, a much more charitable work; which even they, who were not endued with miraculous gifts, might attempt and effect, as well as their more distinguished brethren. (Note, 14,15.) This would also continue to be the duty of all believers, and a most desirable service; when miracles had ceased, and even to the end of the world. (Note, 1 Cor. 12:27—31. 13:1—7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The rich, who are luxurious and haughty, yea, all who now scornfully refuse to mourn for their sins, will soon be forced to "weep and howl, under the miseries which are coming upon them." All their idolized treasures will soon corrupt and perish; except as they will rise up in judgment against them, and "torment them as fire" by increasing their condemnation. The doom of unfaithful stewards will then be very dreadful: but the cruel injustice and oppression, with which many treat their dependents and laborers, by whose toil and ingenuity they are enriched, and whom they leave to penury and distress, will cry for most tremendous vengeance, "in the ears of the Lord of hosts." What then will it avail them, that they have "lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton," and cherished their carnal hearts, as the fatted ox for the slaughter? They have only "heaped up" perishing "treasure," to leave it behind them; or "fared sumptuously every day," as a prelude to "lifting up their eyes in hell being in torments."—Such warnings, however, when impartially given, will expose the servants of Christ to their contemptuous indignation: and thus prosperous sinners have often been excited to condemn and murder the righteous and unresisting disciples; as the Jews did "the Lord of glory" himself.—But let the poor and afflicted Christian "patiently wait for the coming of his Lord," as "the husbandman waits for the precious fruit of the earth;" the good seed, which he now sows in pain, and waters with tears, will spring up and soon ripen to a harvest of eternal joy. (Notes, Ps. 126:5,6. P. O.) Let us then "patiently continue in well doing," having "our hearts established with grace," and realizing expectations of the great day of retribution.—It does not become Christians to grudge one against another; or to envy, repine, despond, or dispute: rather let us prepare to meet our "Judge, who standeth at the door," that we may not be condemned at his coming: for all our eternal interests are secure, if we have trusted them in his hand; and all else is a mere vanity, which will soon be done with forever. May we then "follow prophets and apostles," "as they followed Christ," in patiently suffering affliction, and meekly bearing injuries: for they, and they only, are and will be happy, who endure amidst tribulations, even unto the end. The event will clear up the darkness of all the Lord's dealings with his people: and whatever they or others have thought during the continuance of their trials, in the end it will appear as evident in the case of every one of them, as it did in that of Job, nay, far more illustriously evident, that "the Lord is pitiful and of tender mercy," and that they are happy, who patiently trust in him, and keep his commandments.

V. 12—20.

It is peculiarly important to the interests of genuine piety, that all who profess the gospel, should reverence the name of God, and keep at a distance from swearing, and the profane language, which abounds in the world; and from that insincerity which is intimately connected with it; that "their yea may be yea, and their nay, nay." Indeed such as neglect these things have little reason to conclude, that they shall escape condemnation, when the Judge appears.—The voice of prayer should always accompany that of our lamentations, when we are afflicted; and our joy should be expressed in the language of praise and thanksgiving. We should receive pain and sickness as the chas tisement of the Lord, and seek relief from him, whatever instruments or means we employ for that purpose. The counsels and prayers of the ministers and disciples of Christ are peculiarly desirable on such occasions: and we ought more earnestly to seek the pardon of our sins, and the healing of our souls, than the removal of our bodily sufferings. (P. O. Matt. 9:1—8.)—Christians may profitably confer together concerning their conflicts, sins, and temptations, that they may encourage, warn, counsel, exhort, and properly pray for each other: and they should never be backward to confess those offences, which they have committed against their brethren; or to forgive such as have been done against them. We ought greatly to desire, and highly to value, the prayers of our fellow Christians, and to abound in supplications for them; “as the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.” Nor ought we to be discouraged from this duty, by the consciousness of our weakness, unworthiness, or sinful passions; as they, who of old received such signal answers to their prayers, were “men of like passions with us:” and we have as good reason to expect, that God will answer our humble believing requests for such things as he has promised, and as are really for our good, and his glory, as Jacob, Moses, Elijah, Hezekiah, or Daniel had, or any other person who “wrestled with him and prevailed.”—In the use of all proper means, every one of us should seek the spiritual good of our children, relatives, friends, enemies, and all around us, and the conversion of ignorant and thoughtless profligates and sinners of every description; as well as the recovery of such as have wandered from the way of truth and holiness: considering, that if in one instance only, during the course of our whole lives, and after ten thousand disappointments, we are made successful instruments in “saving a soul from death, and covering a multitude of sins;” the event is of so vast importance, that it will abundantly repay all our toil, anxiety, and disappointment; being far greater, than the preservation of the lives of multitudes, or promoting the temporal prosperity of whole nations. (P. O. Luke 15:1—10.) Let us then, in our several stations, keep these things in mind, and spare no pains, and shrink from no self-denial, and be wearied out by no ill success, in so charitable a service; and the event will prove that “our labor was not in vain in the Lord.”

FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER.

WE have had repeated opportunities of considering the character and apostleship of Peter, who wrote this epistle, and that which follows, as far as they are made known by the holy scriptures. Much additional information concerning him, however, has been conveyed down by tradition, and by ecclesiastical history: but a large proportion of it is absolutely incompatible with the Acts of the Apostles, and many things in St. Paul's epistles; much more is dubious, and the pretensions of the church and bishop of Rome, as grounded on these records and traditions, are so absurd and extravagant, as to deserve little notice, or to require any further refutation. It is not absolutely certain that Peter ever was at Rome; though it is highly probable that he went thither, towards the close of his life: and that he was there put to death by crucifixion, at, or near the same time, when Paul, as a Roman citizen, was beheaded, during Nero's persecution. He wrote this epistle, probably some time before, to the Christians in the different provinces of Asia Minor. Many indeed, and some of high respectability, have endeavored to prove, that, as the apostle of the circumcision, he addressed the Jewish converts only: but Peter was distinguished, not only as the chief preacher to the Jews on the day of Pentecost, but also as the first preacher to the Gentiles. And as Paul, “the apostle of the uncircumcision,” wrote to the Hebrews, and in all his epistles addressed the Jewish as well as the Gentile converts; we may well suppose, that St. Peter addressed the Gentile, as well as the Jewish converts; though perhaps with a peculiar reference to the case of the latter. (Notes, Acts 2: 10:) Indeed, the contrary opinion is founded on some passages in the epistle, which are capable of another, and more natural interpretation: while the apostle's language in other places cannot at all consist with it. It also seems evident, that he wrote to the very churches, which had been founded by St. Paul, intentionally to corroborate his testimony, and to confute those, who maintained that his doctrine differed from that of the other apostles; and he sent the epistle by Silvanus, St. Paul's faithful and constant coadjutor; often indeed called Silas, by abbreviation; as Priscilla is called Prisca. (2 Tim. 4:19.) And as those churches consisted of converted Jews and Gentiles; and as the epistle of Peter conveyed instruction equally suited to both; why should it be imagined, that he meant it for the perusal of only one part of them? The epistle is dated from Babylon, in the remains or vicinity of which city it is probable a Christian church had been planted, perhaps consisting principally of the descendants of the Jews, who remained in those regions after the Babylonish captivity. For no satisfactory reason can be assigned, for supposing, as many have done, in ancient and modern times, that here Babylon signifies Rome. Language of this kind suited the nature of St. John's Revelation; but was wholly unsuitable to the date of a letter. (Note, 5:13.)—We here find the same great doctrines, with which St. Paul's epistles are replete, applied to the same practical purposes. And it is peculiarly remarkable for the sweetness, gentleness, and humble love, with which it is written; which indeed forms a striking contrast to the domineering pride and severity, that characterize the pretended successors of this sacred writer.—Various opinions have been entertained of the time, when the epistle was written; but as no certainty seems attainable, it is dated according to the author's opinion on the subject, in which, however, he is by no means confident.

CHAP. I.

The apostle addresses the strangers of the dispersion in Pontus, &c. with salutations, and thanksgivings to God for his abundant mercy, and the inestimable blessings bestowed on them, 1—5. He shows the nature and benefit of their trials, and the joy by which they were counterbalanced, 6, 7. Through faith, they loved and rejoiced in an unseen Saviour, and received his salvation, 8, 9. The ancient prophets had most diligently inquired into this salvation; angels desired to look into it; and the Holy Spirit confirmed and prospered the preaching of it by the apostles, 10—12. This should animate Christians to a holy and circumspect conduct, as the worshippers of a holy God, 13—17; and as redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, through whom they believed and hoped in God, 18—21. Exhortations to the pure and fervent love of Christians to one another; being brethren by regeneration, through the word of God, which, as "an incorruptible seed," endureth for ever," in the endeared relation thus formed, and in all things, 22—25.

Note.—The churches here addressed were situated in Asia Minor, (as distinguished from the continent of Asia;) and Asia (as mentioned separately) was the proconsular district, of which Ephesus was the capital city; (Note, Acts 19:8—12.) so that they were chiefly the churches which had been planted by St. Paul, and by the evangelists who accompanied or helped him. (Marg. Ref. d—h.) The apostle called the persons, to whom he wrote, "strangers;" and some have labored to prove, that they were 'proselytes of the gate,' who had embraced the gospel; as Cornelius and his friends are supposed to have been before their conversion. Others confine it to the Jewish converts, who were thus distinguished, as living at a distance from the promised land, among the Gentiles. But as Christians are "strangers and pilgrims upon earth;" and as the sojourning of the patriarchs, or of the Jews, in foreign nations, was a type or emblem of this pilgrimage; (Notes, 2:11. Heb. 11:13—16.) it is more natural to understand it of believers in general, who were pilgrims or "strangers," in every city or country where they lived, and who were "scattered" through the nations, to be as "lights in the world, and the salt of the earth." (Notes, 5:13—16.) These the apostle addressed, as "Elect," or "chosen in Christ;" "ac-cording to the foreknowledge of God." (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 11:1—6. Eph. 1:3—12. 2 Thes. 2:13,14.) This eternal purpose and love and election of "God the Father" had been rendered effectual, "through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience," begun in regenera-tion, and carried on in the continued mortifica-tion of their whole sinful nature, and the pro-gressive renewal of their souls to the holy im-age of God, thus preparing them for unreserv-ed "obedience," from evangelical motives, to the commands of Christ our Saviour. This was accompanied with "the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus," or the continual application of the virtue of his atonement to their con-sciences, by faith, for the removal of their guilt, and the rendering of their persons and services accepted with God: as the blood of the legal sacrifices was applied, by sprinkling it around the altar, and before the mercy-seat, on the great day of atonement, or as the blood of the sacrifices was sprinkled on the people, when the covenant was ratified with Israel at mount Sinai. (Notes, Ex. 24:6—8. Lev. 16:11—16. Heb. 9:11—23. 10:19—22. 11:28. 12:22—25.) To these persons the apostle wished and pray-ed, "that grace and peace might be multiplied," according to the salutation generally used by St. Paul. (Note, Rom. 1:5—7.) Thus they were taught, at the opening of the epistle, to ascribe their salvation to the electing love of the Father, the redemption of the Son, and the sanctification of the Holy Spirit; and so to give glory to one God in three persons, into whose name they had been baptized. (Note, Matt. 28:19,20.)—Elect, &c. (2) 'Those, who in 'their outward profession, and in the due judg-ment of charity, are justly reputed for the 'elect of God, according to the eternal decree 'and good purposes of God the Father.' Bp. Hall.—Sprinkling, &c.] 'Men are not easily 'convinced ... of the deep stain of sin, and that 'no other laver can fetch it out, "but the sprink-ling of the blood of Jesus Christ." Some, that 'have moral resolutions of amendment, dislike 'at least gross sins, and purpose to avoid them; 'and it is to them cleanness enough to reform 'in these things: but they consider not what 'becomes of the guiltiness that they have con-tracted already; or how that shall be purged. '—Be not deceived in this: it is not a transient 'sigh, or a light word, or a wish of, God forgive 'me; no, nor the highest current of repentance,

'nor, that which is the truest evidence of repentance, amendment: it is none of these, that purifies in the sight of God and expiates wrath. They are all imperfect and stained themselves, cannot stand and answer for themselves; much less be of value to counterpoise the former guilt of sin. The very tears of the purest repentance, unless they be sprinkled with this blood, are impure; all our washings without this, are but the washings of a blackamoor; it is labor in vain.' *Arbp. Strangers. (1) Παροικητοῖς. 2:11. Heb. 11:13.—Scattered.] Διασποράς. John 7:35. Jam. 1:1.—This word may seem to favor the opinion, that the epistle was written to Jewish converts exclusively: but the apostle used several terms, taken from what had been said of that nation, in relation to Christians, where this opinion cannot stand. (Note, 2:9,10.)—Be multiplied. (2) Πληθυνθῆεν. 2 Pet. 1:2. This is not found in St. Paul's salutations: at the same time St. Peter does not add "From God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ;" (Note, 1 Cor. 1:3.) but in his second epistle he says, "Through the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord." (Note, John 17:1—3.)

Note.—St. Peter, as well as his "beloved brother Paul," opened his subject, by calling on his fellow Christians to join with him, in blessing God for his distinguishing mercy and grace, under the title of "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." (Note, Eph. 1:3—8.) "Of his abundant mercy," or the greatness of his compassionate love, to the guilty, the polluted, and the wretched, even such as were "dead in sin and children of wrath, he had regenerated them:" and from this gracious change, wrought in them by his divine power, their repentance, faith, and obedience had originated. (Notes, John 1:10—13. 3:1—8. Eph. 2:3—10. Col. 2:13—15. 2 Tim. 1:9. Tit. 1:1—4. 3:3—7. Jam. 1:16—18.) Thus, as "the children of God," they were brought to possess "a lively" or living "hope," active, influential, and invigorating. They were no longer left to be influenced principally by any of the hopes, which worldly men indulge of obtaining satisfaction in temporal things; or to the presumptuous and inefficacious hope of mercy and salvation, by which formalists and hypocrites are deceived: but they were made partakers of a well-grounded hope of salvation, which was an active, living principle in their souls, of patient and cheerful obedience. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 15:8—13. 1 Cor. 15:55—58. Eph. 2:11—13. Col. 1:3—8. 2 Thes. 2:16,17. Heb. 6:16—20. 1 John 3:1—3.) This regeneration, and the hope resulting from it, were consequences arising from "the resurrection of Christ." His atoning Sacrifice having been accepted, he had been raised from the dead, proving that he was "the Son of God," and that he had done his work on earth, and in order to the performance of his mediatory office in heaven: that, by communicating, through his intercession, the Holy Spirit, to give efficacy to the preaching of the gospel, sinners might be raised from the death of sin, by a continuation, as it were, of that power which restored to life the dead body of Christ. (Notes, Eph. 1:15—23.) Thus they had "been begotten or born again to an inheritance," which was of a very different nature, from those which worldly men sought for. For earthly inheritances are corruptible in themselves, and in respect of their possessors; defiled, in respect of the means by which they are obtained, the use which is generally made of them, and the persons who possess them; and fading, as to the very trivial comfort, honor, or distinction which they confer, and its withering nature, especially as possession soon abates the relish with which the objects were at first received. But the inheritance to which the regenerate are entitled, and for which they hope, is "incorruptible" in itself, and they will be rendered incorruptible and immortal to enjoy it; (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:50—54. Phil. 3:20,21.) it is "undefiled," in respect of its pleasures, and the character of all those who partake of them; (Notes, 2 Pet. 3:10—13. Rev. 21:22—27. P. O. 9—27. Note, 22:1—5.) and "unfading," as to its satisfaction, glory, and splendor, which will be unalloyed, unsullied, permanent, uninterrupted, always increasing, and eternal. By regeneration, they not only obtained a hope of this inheritance, and the meetness for it, but also the title to it. "If children, then heirs." So that it was "reserved in heaven," out of the reach of all enemies and changes, in the abode of perfect holiness and felicity, "for them," even for the elect, or the regenerate, who "were kept," as in a strongly fortified and garrisoned castle, "by the power of God," engaged by covenant to fulfil his irrevocable promises, and the purposes of his everlasting love. (Note, Col. 3:1—4.) Thus, having entered through Christ "the Door," into this "strong Tower," by faith; and still exercising faith on the promises of God, and on his perfections as engaged to perform them; and this faith being kept from failing, through the continual intercession of Christ, and grace bestowed by him; (Note, Luke 23:31—34.) they would certainly be preserved in all dangers, and protected against all enemies, internal and external, unto complete salvation. (Notes, John 10:6—9,26—31. Rom. 8:32—39.) This was in all respects prepared and “ready” for them: but the appointed season of their full enjoyment of it was not yet arrived; so that it still remained, as it were, veiled: but it would be revealed, manifested, and publicly conferred on them, at “the last time,” even at Christ’s coming to raise the dead, to judge the world, and to destroy all ungodly men. 6 Wherein <sup>h</sup> ye greatly rejoice, though now <sup>i</sup> for a season, <sup>k</sup> if need be, <sup>l</sup> ye are in heaviness through <sup>m</sup> manifold temptations:

Note.—In the earnest and hopes of eternal salvation, true Christians “greatly rejoiced,” or exulted: at least, they were required to do so. (Notes, Rom. 5:1—5.) This was the genuine effect of faith, in proportion to its strength; though at the present, “for a transient season,” they might be, and often were, “in heaviness,” and dejected, through a variety of afflictions and trials in their outward circumstances through the remaining sinfulness of their hearts, and the harassing assaults of Satan. (Notes, 2 Cor. 4:13—18. 6:3—10. Jam. 1:2—4,12—15.) These troubles and conflicts interrupted their rejoicings, by short intervals; but they were “needful,” in order to their permanent good, and for the glory of God: otherwise he would no more have appointed them, than a kind and wise father would needlessly afflict his beloved child; or a physician would prescribe nauseous medicines, without occasion, to his dearest friend. For all these sorrows were intended to make a complete trial of their faith, that it might be proved to be genuine. They professed to believe in Christ, and to love him; and it was proper, that the sincerity of this profession should be ascertained, that they might be distinguished from all hypocrites. This was effected by persecutions, afflictions, and temptations, as gold is distinguished from base metal, as well as purified, in the refiner’s furnace. (Note, Mal. 3:1—4.) But the faith of Christians was immensely more precious than gold, which is of a perishing nature, and can only purchase perishing things; whereas faith interested the soul in the “unsearchable riches of Christ,” and the unchangeable promises of God, and entitled it to eternal felicity: so that the trial of it was proportionably more important and advantageous. It was therefore proper that it should be tried in the fire of tribulation, by which the dead faith of hypocrites was generally consumed; as they renounced Christ to escape the cross, and to secure worldly advantages. But the living faith of the regenerate was thus manifested to be genuine, by their steadfastly cleaving to Christ and his will, at any price; their faith indeed being increased and purified by the trial. (Notes, 4:12—16. Zech. 13:8,9. Jam. 1:2—4.) They would also have the comfort of it, and God the glory, at present; and it would be “found to praise, and honor, and glory,” in the presence of the whole creation, when Christ should appear to judge the world; and when no degree of applause, or weight of glory, could excite pride, as they would do while sin remained in the heart. To this joyful event all true believers looked forward with serious preparation.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The Christians, to whom St. Peter wrote, had, in general, never “seen Christ” during his humiliation, and they were not at present admitted to see him in his glory, as they would at length do. Yet they loved his Person, his divine perfections, his human excellencies, and his mediatorial suitableness; they were earnestly desirous of his favor and salvation; they were thankful for his unspeakable love, and the benefits conferred on them;

they rejoiced in his exaltation, and were zealous for his glory; and this led them to cleave to him and obey him; to love his people, ordinances, truths, and commandments; and to give up whatever intervened between him and their souls, or was his rival in their affections. (Notes, Matt. 10:37—39. 25:34—40. John 8:44—47. 21:15—17. 1 Cor. 16:21—24. Eph. 6:21—24.) This love of an unseen Saviour sprang from "faith" in him: they believed the testimony of God, by his apostles, concerning him and his glorious excellencies; and concerning what he had done and suffered for sinners, and his power, grace, and truth. By this faith they had intrusted their souls into his hands, and they depended on him to pardon, cleanse, and save them. From this "faith working by love," they derived a joy, which was so excellent, holy, substantial, and satisfactory, that it could not be expressed by words; as it was "full of glory," or glorified; of the same nature and effects with the glory and felicity of heaven. They shared this joy, in proportion to the degree of their living faith and obedient love; while they delighted in the salvation which was brought by him, and in their rapturous discoveries of the glory of God, harmoniously anticipating the everlasting felicity of all believers in Christ; and while they possessed the earnestness of this felicity, in the graces and consolations of the Holy Spirit, and in communion with the Father and his beloved Son. This faith, love, and joy, in respect of an unseen Saviour, constituted the peculiar experience, and formed the distinguishing character, of real Christians; who thus were assured that they should receive that "salvation of their souls," which was the end proposed by them, when they believed; indeed they were continually receiving that salvation in the earnestness, comforts, and sanctification of it, amidst their trials and conflicts. (Note, John 20:24—29.)

11 Searching what, or what manner of time, <sup>e</sup> the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand <sup>f</sup> the sufferings of Christ, and <sup>g</sup> the glory that should follow.

12 Unto whom <sup>h</sup> it was revealed, <sup>i</sup> that not unto themselves, but unto us they did minister the things, which are now reported unto you by them <sup>k</sup> that have preached the gospel unto you <sup>l</sup> with the Holy Ghost <sup>m</sup> sent down from heaven; <sup>n</sup> which things the angels desire to look into.

Note.—The "salvation," before spoken of, had been predicted by the prophets from the beginning: so that their writings were peculiarly worthy of the attentive consideration of Christians. (Notes, Luke 24:25—31,44—49. John 5:39—47. Rev. 19:9,10.) These ancient servants of God had themselves most earnestly and diligently investigated the meaning of their own predictions; not being able fully to understand what that "grace" was, which was intended for those, who should live after the coming of the Messiah. (Notes, Matt. 13:16,17. Heb. 11:13—16,39,40.) They therefore searched, as miners do for the precious metals, that they might discover when, and in "what manner of time," those things would occur, which "the Spirit of Christ," who dwelt in them, did intend by the predictions, which he suggested to them. For they did not know the full import of their own words, while they "testified long before" that the Messiah would pass through a variety of complicated sufferings, even unto death; and that he would afterwards be glorified, in his personal exaltation, and in the extent, peace, and duration of his mediatorial kingdom, the happiness of his subjects, and the destruction of his enemies. (Note, Ps. 2:22:69:72. Is. 9:6,7. 11:1—10. 53: Dan. 9:24—27.)—The Holy Spirit is here spoken of, as a distinct Person; and as "the Spirit of Christ," not only in that he spake of him, but as sent forth by him long before his incarnation.—Both in the express prophecies of the Messiah, and in all the typical persons, events, and institutions which related to him; his sufferings were uniformly represented as introducing his glory, and the glories (τας δόξας) of his kingdom. The prophets had been immediately instructed, that they should not live to witness the accomplishment of their own predictions; and that neither they, nor their contemporaries, would derive the principal benefit of their ministry, or enjoy the privileges announced by them. But they were laboring for the benefit of future generations: whilst they declared those great events, which had at length taken place, and had been reported to the Jews and Gentiles, by the apostles of Christ, who had preached the gospel to them; whose ministry was attested by the miraculous operations of the Holy Spirit, and rendered successful by his life-giving and sanctifying influences; and who was "sent down from heaven" to bear testimony to the performance of those prophecies, which he had of old inspired. fact, these mysteries of redemption contained such displays of the wisdom, power, truth, justice, holiness, and mercy of God; that "the angels desired," with great earnestness and persevering attention, "to look into them," and to join in adoration of the divine Redeemer; like the cherubim who were represented as bowing down to look upon the ark of the covenant. (Note, Ex. 25:10-21.) They, as it were, left the glories of heaven, to study the divine perfections, and to learn new songs of adoring praise, in the stable at Bethlehem, in the desert, in Gethsemane, on mount Calvary, and from "the church," which "God manifested in the flesh" had "purchased with his own blood." He spake in Isaiah, in Elias, and in the mouth of the prophets. So the fathers.—Shall holy prophets be so desirous to know the time, when these things should happen; and holy angels to look into these glorious revelations? And shall we, to whom, and for whose happiness, this gospel was revealed, neglect, not only to obtain, but even to know, this great salvation?" Whitby.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—As the "salvation" of Christ had attracted the attention of prophets from the beginning; as it was "preached by apostles, with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven," and as "angels desired to look down into it;" it behoved those who were favored with the gospel, to avail themselves of their advantages, and to make suitable returns, with all diligence and alacrity. They ought therefore "to gird up the loins of their minds," (Notes, Luke 12:35-46. Eph. 6:14-17.) by laying aside all carnal prejudices and all anxious cares about the things of this life, with such occupations, desires, and pursuits, as might prevent their clearly understanding, cordially choosing, and cheerfully obeying the word of truth; and using all means of removing impediments, of invigorating holy affections, and of animating themselves and each other, in diligently serving and patiently suffering for Christ. (Notes, Heb. 12:1-3.) They were also especially required to be "sober;" serious, considerate, moderate, and temperate in all things, vigilant, and steadfast in the faith: "hoping perfectly," or, "to the end;" that, notwithstanding all inward conflicts and outward discouragements, the Lord would fulfil his promises, and bring them to his eternal glory; entirely relying on his omnipotence, omniscience; and infinite perfections, to sanctify, protect, and uphold them; and to save them, in all cases, and against all enemies. Thus they should "hold fast the blessed hope" of that "grace," or free unmerited favor, which will "be brought to" all true Christians, and publicly conferred on them, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed, to judge the world and destroy the wicked. (Notes, Matt. 25:31-40. 1 Thes. 4:13-18. 2 Thes. 1:5-10. 1 Tim. 6:13-16. 2 Tim. 4:6-8. Heb. 9:27, 28. 2 Pet. 3:10-13. 1 John 2:26-29.) They had indeed been "children of disobedience" and "of wrath," but, being born of God, they had become "children of obedience," and disposed to obey their heavenly Father. This was their profession and character: and, in consistency with it, they must not order their conduct and discourse, or form their plans, in any respect, according to the maxims of the world, or the lusts which they had obeyed and indulged, when they were ignorant of God and true religion: as both Jews and Gentiles had done, while unregenerate; being destitute of any humbling or spiritual knowledge of divine things. (Notes, John 8:54-59. 16:1-3.) But as this blessed change had taken place in them, by the efficacious calling of God, who, being perfectly holy in himself, had purposed to make them happy in his holy service and favor; so they ought now to "be holy in" every part of their temper, conduct, and conversation, in imitation of his holiness, and in conformity to it. This had been required of Israel under the law; (Notes, Lev. 11:41-45. 19:2.) and without this, they could not comfortably walk with God, acceptably worship him at present, or enjoy heaven at last. 17 And if ye <sup>c</sup> call on the Father, <sup>d</sup> who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work, <sup>e</sup> pass the time of your sojourning here <sup>f</sup> in fear:

19 But <sup>l</sup> with the precious blood of Christ, <sup>m</sup> as of a Lamb without blemish and without spot:

21 Who <sup>q</sup> by him do believe in God, <sup>r</sup> that raised him up from the dead, and <sup>s</sup> gave him glory; that <sup>t</sup> your faith and hope might be in God. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—Seeing they, to whom the apostle wrote, now “called on the Father” of the Lord Jesus, and their Father in him; they ought to remember, that “without respect of persons, he judged according to every man's work.” (Notes, Acts 10:34,35. Rom. 2:7—11.) They ought not therefore to suppose, that any name or form would avail them; or that God would approve of any man, merely because he had been a Jew, or because he was now called a Christian: for he would certainly judge every man's profession and character by his works, appoint hypocrites their portion with unbelievers, and finally condemn every “worker of iniquity.” (Notes, Jam. 2:14—26.) Nay, if believers did any evil thing, God would not connive at it, because of their relation to him; but he would surely visit them with sharp rebukes and corrections, and refuse them his consolations, till they had deeply repented of it. It therefore behoved them to “pass the time” of their pilgrimage, in this evil world, “in fear,” as well as in “hope:” not doubting of the faithfulness of God to his promises, or giving way to discouraging, enslaving dread of his wrath; but being humbly jealous of themselves, and watchful over their own hearts, fearing lest they should be deceived and come short, lest they should dishonor God, or incur his awful rebukes, and lest they should fall into temptation; and uniting their confidence in the Lord's mercy with reverence of his majesty, holiness, and authority. (Notes, Rom. 11:16—21. Heb. 4:1,2. 12:25—29.)—For the Christian's best state of mind is, a due proportion of humble fear and believing hope, at an equal distance from presumption and despondency. Without hope, a man is like a ship which has no anchor; without fear, he resembles one without ballast. The fearless professor is defenceless; and Satan “takes him captive at his will;” while he who desponds has no heart to avail himself of his advantages, and surrenders at discretion.—The apostle, therefore, exhorted his brethren to “fear always,” as well as to “hope to the end:” especially considering at what a price they had been redeemed.—Once they had lived in a vain unprofitable manner, ordering their whole conversation according to “traditions received from their fathers.” The Jews in general had rested in the legal ceremonies, and the “traditions of the elders;” the Gentiles in the absurd fables and idolatrous worship, which had been transmitted to them from their ancestors; and both were at an immense distance from spiritual religion. But they had been redeemed from this state of slavery, and wretched imprisonment, into which they had been sold for their crimes; not only by power exerted, but by a price paid for them, as a satisfaction to the justice of God, that he might act honorably in delivering them. This price had not consisted of “corruptible things,” such “as silver and gold,” the treasures which men generally most value; but it had been paid with “the blood of Christ,” “the Son of the living God,” which was indeed most precious, by reason of his divine nature and excellency; so that it was sufficient to render it glorious to the justice and law of God, for the sake of it, to show mercy and give grace to sinners of every nation and description. (Notes, John 1:29.) For this was “the Lamb of God,” without the least spot or “blemish, and without spot” of sin, of whose purity and excellency, as well as his sufferings unto death, the innumerable multitude of paschal lambs, and daily burnt-offerings, under the law, had been no more than shadows. He had indeed been “fore-ordained” to this work, (which none else could have performed,) “from before the foundation of the world,” in the eternal counsels of God; and he had been promised as soon as sin had entered: but he had not been personally manifested, “to take away sin by the sacrifice of himself,” till these “last times” in consequence of which he was now openly proclaimed, by the preaching of the gospel, as the Saviour of all men, Jews or Gentiles, who came to him, and to God by him. For the whole benefit was intended for those, who by his grace and through his intercession and atonement, relied on the mercy, truth, and power of God for salvation: being assured that he had raised the crucified Jesus from the dead, and conferred on him the predicted glory, for this very purpose, that sinners, when made sensible of their guilt, and their entire inability to justify, sanctify, and save themselves, or to appear before their just and holy Judge, might fix their faith and hope on God, as reconciled to all believers in his Son, and for his sake engaged to fulfil all his promises to them.—Fear. (17) ‘Why should he, that hath assurance of ‘salvation, fear? 22 Seeing <sup>a</sup> ye have purified your souls, <sup>1</sup> in obeying the truth <sup>2</sup> through the Spirit, <sup>2</sup> unto unfeigned love of the brethren, <sup>a</sup> see that ye love one another with <sup>b</sup> a pure heart fervently:

Note.—The souls of those whom the apostle addressed, like those of all other men, had been polluted with ungodliness, pride, malice, self- ishness, and worldly lusts: but they “had pu- rified their souls” from the prevailing influence of these evils, as well as from the guilt of their actual sins, in the method which God had ap- pointed for that purpose. They had been shown by “the word of truth” their need of this purification, and taught in what way it might be effected: and “in obeying the truth,” by repentance, faith in Christ, and the use of ‘the means of grace;’ they were thus cleansed from their “filthiness and idols,” and the several faculties of their souls were purified and sanctified, to serve God in righteousness and true holiness. This purification had been ef- fected, “through the Spirit,” who first quick- ened, convinced, and humbled them, and so led them to repent, believe, and obey; and after- wards they had sought further degrees of holi- ness, in dependence on his gracious and power- ful influences, and in compliance with them: so that they indeed were active and earnest in this matter, but He had given them both the will and the power. (Notes, Rom. 8:12,13. Phil. 2:12,13.) One peculiar effect and evidence, of this “purity of heart” consisted in “unfeigned love of the brethren.” They had thus been led to love the image of Christ in his people, and to esteem them highly, though once they would have despised and hated them: they had learned to love their company, to sympathize in their sorrows, to rejoice in their comforts, to do them good, and to live at peace with them. This they did unfeignedly, by choice and in uprightness, and they evinced it by giving up their own interest or indulgence for their bene- fit. Their love of each other was in this respect far different from that hollow show of friendship and affection, which prevails in the world; and which is chiefly expressed by insincere profes- sions and unmeaning compliments. (Notes, Rom. 12:9—13. Jam. 2:14—18. 3:17,18. 1 John 3:18—24.) As they had then attained to a measure of this disinterested love; let them see to it, as of the greatest importance, that they loved one another more and more. (Notes, Phil. 1:9—11. 1 Thes. 4:9—12.) Using the same means, and depending on the same Spirit, let them seek more entire purity from every selfish, envious, or malevolent affection; that no anger, bitterness, prejudice, or carnal passions might warp, debase, or interrupt their mutual love; and that it might grow more fer- vent and intense, and be manifested in more self-denying endeavors to promote each other's temporal comfort and spiritual advantages.

23 Being <sup>c</sup> born again, <sup>d</sup> not of corrupti- ble seed, <sup>e</sup> but of incorruptible, <sup>f</sup> by the word of God which liveth and abideth for ever.

24 * For <sup>g</sup> all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower there- of falleth away;

25 But <sup>h</sup> the word of the Lord endureth for ever. And <sup>i</sup> this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you.

Note.—This brotherly love was indeed in some sense natural to them, not as men, but as Christians; as they were all children of one family, and more nearly related than any earthly brethren could be. (Notes, Eph. 2:14—22.) For they were “born again; not of corruptible seed,” as all the human race are born of Adam's fallen nature, to sicken and die, and so to re- turn to corruption and dust, in respect of their bodies: whilst the soul, unless regenerate, must sink into misery: nor yet were they merely distinguished from others, as the natural posterity of Abraham, which was only “a corruptible seed:” but they were “born again of an incor- ruptible seed, even by the word of God” im- planted in their hearts by the Holy Spirit. (Notes, 3—5. John 1:10—13. 3:3—8. Jam. 1: 16—18.) This, being immutable and eternal truth in itself, “liveth, and abideth for ever,” in the effects produced by it on their hearts, ac- cording to the promises of God; being the seed of a divine life, and powerfully operating a total change in the judgment, dispositions, and affec- tions of the soul. (Notes, Heb. 4:12,13. 1 John 3:7—10. 5:16—18.) So that all, who were “born again,” (however before separated and distinguished,) were thenceforth “brethren” by an enduring and eternal relation; which will flourish, when all other relations shall be dis- solved, or lost in total enmity. For “all flesh,” all that is born of Adam's fallen nature, is as grass; and “all the glory of man,” whatever any of the human race ever boasted of, or re- joiced in, was and is but as the “flower of the grass:” whether it be noble or royal birth, genius, wisdom, learning, accomplishments,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

As we, if true Christians, are “strangers” on earth, we should expect contempt and unkindness from the men of this world, and continually prepare for a removal to our eternal home: and we should remember, that we are “scattered” in different countries, cities, and families, as witnesses for God and his truth, to those among whom we live.—All the redeemed were “elected according to the foreknowledge of God the Father:” but this cannot be known by them, except “through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience.” (Note, 1 Thes. 1:1—4.) But when our simple dependence on the atoning blood of Christ, unites with a holy hatred of all sin, and a disposition to obey all the commandments of God, and to delight in them; we may be sure, that we are the objects of his “everlasting love,” and that “grace and peace will be multiplied unto” us, till they shall be perfected in the felicity of heaven. “The lively hope of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading,” which springs from regeneration, is inseparably connected with faith in a crucified and risen Saviour; it ascribes all salvation to the “abundant mercy of God,” and excites the possessor to love and practise holiness. It is peculiar to the real Christian; and it totally differs from the vain confidence of formalists, Pharisees, Antinomians, and enthusiasts of every description. If we thus hope for an undefiled felicity, and habitually prepare for it; we may well rejoice, and exult triumphantly that it is “reserved for us in heaven,” and that “we are kept” as in a castle “by the power of God, through faith unto salvation,” which is made ready, and will be openly revealed when the mystery of God shall be finished.

V. 6—9.

“The lively” and assured “hope of an inheritance in heaven,” gives substantial joy to the soul, and to it we must have recourse in all our troubles, for support and animation: yet we cannot but sometimes “be in heaviness,” when called to struggle with “ manifold temptations,” to conflict with inward enemies, to walk in darkness without sensible comfort, and to endure afflictions in body, mind, or circumstances. Even they, who “have the first-fruits of the Spirit,” do, on such occasions, “groan, being burdened.” (Notes, Rom. 7:22—25. 8:18—23.) And though “the Lord does not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men;” yet his wise love often appoints sharp trials for his people, because he knows them to be necessary in order to “humble and prove them, to show what is in their hearts, and to do them good at the latter end.” When this is the case, or when his glory in any way requires it, they will be “in heaviness” for a short season: (Note, 2 Cor. 4:13—18.) but neither their trial, nor the peculiar distressing circumstances connected with them, will be sharper, more numerous, or of longer continuance, than it is needful that they should be, in order to try their precious faith, that it may “be found unto praise, and honor, and glory, at the coming of the Lord Jesus.” In the intervals of their temptations and conflicts, when they are composed enough to make observations on their experience, their trials, conflicts, and the event of them they can find, that they really do believe in and love an unseen Saviour; and show that faith and love by cleaving to him, and aiming to obey him, in the midst of their troubles. This causes them to rejoice in his all-sufficiency and grace, in his glory and blessedness, and in admiring his infinite loveliness and loving kindness, with a “joy which is unspeakable,” and which forms a sweet antepast of the heavenly felicity; tuning their hearts to the songs of the redeemed, and preparing them for their holy employments. Thus, by the way they receive in part, as an earnest and pledge, “the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls.”

V. 10—16.

While we discourse freely on evangelical and experimental subjects, numbers, either ignorantly or maliciously, charge us with holding novel doctrines, and introducing a new religion: but in fact these principles were first published, as soon as “sin entered into the world;” though they have passed, so to speak, through several enlarged editions: but every thing is new to him, who is hitherto unacquainted with it. Concerning these things the ancient “prophets inquired” and searched with great diligence, that they might know something of the grace preparing for later ages; and for four thousand years “the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow,” formed the great subject of revelation, in multiplied types, promises, and predictions. At length “the desire of nations” appeared, “fulfilled all righteousness,” finished, by his sufferings on the cross, his work on earth, and entered into his glory: then apostles bore testimony to the same important truths, and “the Holy Spirit was sent down from heaven” to authenticate their testimony; while “angels desired to look down into these things,” as eclipsing all former displays of the harmonious perfections of their God. And shall not we then search diligently those scriptures, which contain the joyful and interesting doctrines of salvation? Or shall we neglect the means of appropriating to ourselves its everlasting benefits? Far be this from us! Rather let us throw aside all carnal encumbrances, and use every method of bringing our minds into a proper frame, for attending to this grand concern, and of doing the work of our great Master with alacrity and industry. Let us study to be "sober," in the midst of a giddy, sensual, and intoxicated world; let us "hold fast the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end;" and show ourselves the "obedient children" of God, by avoiding conformity to the world, and by taking care not to "fashion ourselves according to the former lusts in our ignorance;" (Notes, 4: 3-5. Rom. 12:1,12.) but especially watching and praying against those sins, to which we were then most prone or accustomed. Thus let us aim to become "holy in all manner of conversation," even "as God who hath called us is holy:" for he sanctifies all whom he saves, and "without holiness no man shall see the Lord."

V. 17-21.

The God whom we worship "is no Respector of persons;" but does now, and will at last, "judge according to every man's work." He will detect many hypocrites, whom his servants never suspected, and some who never suspected themselves: and he will condemn many, as "workers of iniquity," who called him their Father, and Jesus their Lord and Master. (Notes, Matt. 7:21-23. Luke 13:22-30.) Knowing these things, and aware of the deceitfulness of our hearts, the subtlety of our enemies, and the manifold delusions which are propagated on every side; we should "pass the time of our sojourning" in this perilous world, in humble, watchful, and jealous "fear;" which will best secure us against fatal deceptions, and preserve us from dishonoring God and exposing ourselves to his fatherly corrections. (Notes, Prov. 14:15,16. 23:14. Rom. 11:16-21.) It behoves us also frequently to remember, that all the riches of the world could never have saved one soul from eternal destruction. Why then should we covet such unavailing perishing treasures? (Notes, Ps. 49:6-9. Matt. 16:24-28. P. O. 21-28.)—But how vast are our obligations to the Lord Jesus, the spotless "Lamb of God," whose precious blood was freely shed to ransom our souls, and to obtain eternal salvation for us! May we "by him believe in God, who raised him from the dead and gave him glory, that our faith and hope" may rest on the infinite perfection and love of God, for all things pertaining to our eternal salvation! In this view, how absurd does the conduct of all those appear, who cleave to "the vain conversation delivered to them by tradition from their fathers," and avow a determination never to change the religion, which they have inherited from them! If this principle had been adhered to, "Christ would have died in vain:" for Jews and Gentiles must have agreed in rejecting the gospel, to cleave to the traditions, superstitions, or idolatry of their elders and ancestors: and the case must have continued the same, through all succeeding generations, to the end of the world! So dreadfully absurd and mischievous is this too common notion!

V. 22-25.

It is highly important that men should seriously consider, and be deeply convinced, that their souls must be purified from pollution, or they will inevitably perish; that there is a work and duty for them to attend on in this matter; that they can do nothing in it, except by "obeying the truth;" that they cannot "obey the truth" but by the "Holy Spirit," whom God has promised to give to those that ask him; (Note, Luke 11:5-13.) and that "unfeigned love" of true Christians is one proper test and standard of evangelical purity of heart. If we have attained to this infallible evidence, that "the good work" is begun within us, let us see to it, "that we love one another with a pure heart fervently." Thus it will be more and more evident, that they are "born again of incorruptible seed, by the word of God which liveth and abideth for ever." (Notes, 1 John 4:7,8. 5:1-3.) As this needful and most blessed change is wrought by means of the sacred word of divine life, it is of far greater importance to us, to search the scriptures daily; to use every means to become acquainted with them; and to bring others, in our families or congregations, acquainted with them; than to speculate about the manner, in which they are rendered effectual to this end. All other distinctions will soon be lost, and as it were swallowed up, in the difference between the regenerate and the unregenerate; all other glory will wither, and terminate in everlasting shame and disgrace; all other unions will be dissolved, and perish. But those who are one in Christ Jesus, and are "beautified with his salvation," will be united in perfect love, glory, and felicity, for ever. As "this word of the gospel," which is the seed of eternal life, is preached to us also; let us see to it, that it dwells in our hearts, and brings forth holy fruit in our lives; and then we shall "not be ashamed or confounded, world without end."

CHAP. II.

Christians are exhorted to lay aside selfish and angry passions; that they may long for "the sincere milk of the word," and grow by it, having "tasted that the Lord is gracious." 1-3. The preciousness of Christ, the chief Corner-stone, to believers as built on him, by faith, and thus made a holy temple and a spiritual priesthood, according to the scriptures; while unbelievers stumble and perish, 4-8. The sacred character and invaluable privileges of believers, as called out of darkness into light, to show forth the praises of God, 9-10. The apostle beseeches them to abstain from the praises of God, and by their good conversation to glorify God among the Gentiles, 11, 12. He enforces obedience to magistrates, 13-17, and that of servants to their masters; exhorting them to suffer patiently even for well-doing after the example of Christ, and from love to him, 13-25.

Note.—From the truths, stated in the preceding chapter, the apostle took occasion to exhort his brethren, to "lay aside," as a polluted garment, which they had worn too long, all kinds of "malice, guile, hypocrisies," insincerity in their profession, or flattery and compliment in conversation, with "envyings and all slanders." (Note, Jam. 1:19-21.) This was needful in order that with the simplicity of "new-born infants, they might desire," and relish, the uncorrupted doctrines and precepts of the word of God, as "the new-born babe" craves the nutrimental milk of the breast, and wants no other sustenance: that thus they might grow, by this wholesome food for their souls, in knowledge, faith, hope, love, and every holy affection; and not always be as children; or become dwarfs, who are seldom healthy, comfortable, comely, or useful. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:1-3. Eph. 4:14-16. Heb. 5:11-14.) Such a conduct might be expected from them, and even from those who had lately been converted; "if so be," or since, "they had tasted that the Lord is gracious."—The apostle here applied to Christ, as the context proves, what the Psalmist had spoken of Ἰησοῦν. (Note, Ps. 34:8.)—The Lord is merciful and kind whether men believe it, or not: many have inefficacious notions of his mercy, without any experience or taste of it, and these notions commonly embolden them in rebellion: but regenerate persons believe that he is gracious; they apply to him in that persuasion, and thus they taste and relish his grace, and have an earnest of their future felicity, even "the witness in themselves" of his mercy and truth. (*Notes, Ps. 4:6-8. 51:12,13. 63:5-8. Prov. 14:10. 24:13, 14. 5 Ye <sup>s</sup> also, as lively stones, * are built up a spiritual house, <sup>t</sup> an holy priesthood, to offer up <sup>u</sup> spiritual sacrifices, <sup>x</sup> acceptable to God by Jesus Christ.

6 Wherefore also, <sup>y</sup> it is contained in the scripture, <sup>z</sup> Behold, I lay in Sion a chief Corner-stone, <sup>a</sup> elect, precious; and he that believeth on him <sup>b</sup> shall not be confounded.

Note.—The apostle, having been educated a Jew, and writing to Jewish converts, as well as others, retained the typical language of the Old Testament, concerning a temple, a priesthood, and sacrifices. The temple had been the centre of Ἰησοῦν's worship: there he displayed his glory from the mercy-seat, and dwelt among his people: there he received their worship, and communicated his benefits: there alone God engaged to meet sinners and bless them, and penitent believers approached God to glorify him; for every accepted prayer and service had reference to the worship at the temple. (Notes, Ex. 25:10-22. Lev. 17:3-9. Deut. 12:5-7. 1 Kings 8:28-30.) Thus Christ is the spiritual "Temple, in which God dwells" with men: and believers, as one with him, form a part of the sacred building, and he blesses them; and sinners come to God in Christ, and glorify him. (Notes, John 1:14. 2:14-17.) In allusion to this type, Christ is called "a living stone," as elsewhere "living Bread." The metaphor showed his power, stability, and permanent sufficiency, in his Person and mediation to sustain the whole weight of the glory of God, and the salvation of his people, which was to be laid upon him: and the epithet "living," while it showed that the expression was figurative, pointed out the quickening efficacy of his grace on the souls of those who had been dead in sin, and intimated that he "ever liveth to make intercession" for his people, and to maintain their cause. This Stone was "disallowed of men," both Jews and Gentiles, so long as they continued unregenerate; because men are naturally ignorant, self-wise, self-righteous, carnal, and at enmity with God; so that they cannot receive his humbling holy doctrines and salvation: but it was "chosen of God," to be the Support, Cement, and Ornament of the whole spiritual building; and was most "precious" in itself, and perfectly fitted for that purpose. (Notes, Matt. 16:18. 1 Cor. 3:10-15.) All therefore who are born again, and thus enlightened, humbled, made in a measure spiritual, and taught to seek reconciliation unto God, "come to Christ," to build their hopes and souls on him whom men despised; that they may be made a part of this holy and living Temple; continually applying to him, and to the Father through him, for his salvation, and the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit. Thus they "as living stones," by life derived from Christ, became meet to be built up as a part of this spiritual house, consecrated to God and his holy habitation. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:16,17. 2 Cor. 6:14-18. Eph. 2:19-22.)—But, to show more fully the import of this figurative language, it was proper that the subject should be illustrated by another metaphor: for, by thus coming to Christ, they were washed, anointed, arrayed, and consecrated, as a "holy priesthood," to draw near and minister unto God at his temple. (Notes, Ex. 29: Lev. 8:6-14. Rev. 1:4-6. 5:3-10.) They did not indeed presume to offer atoning sacrifices; but they were consecrated to offer spiritual sacrifices, even prayers, supplications, praises, thanksgivings, good works, and liberal contributions to the poor, especially their indigent brethren; and even their very bodies, as devoted to the service of God. (Notes, Rom. 12:1. Phil. 2:14-18. 4:14-20. Col. 3:16,17. Heb. 13:15,16.) These sacrifices, though defective and defiled, and offered by sinners, would yet be "acceptable to God," because honorable to him, when presented through Jesus Christ, and by faith in his atoning sacrifice and his intercession, as their High Priest within the heavenly sanctuary. The whole of this accorded to a remarkable prophecy, the explanation of which has already been given. (Note, Is. 28:16.)—The quotation varies in some respects from the Septuagint, but gives the general meaning of both that and the Hebrew. (Notes, Rom. 9:30-33.)

8 And <sup>g</sup> a Stone of stumbling, and a Rock of offence, even to them which stumble at the word, <sup>h</sup> being disobedient; <sup>i</sup> whereunto also they were appointed.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Unto those "who believed," Christ was precious, the Foundation of all their hopes, their chief Glory, and most valuable Treasure: for they saw such excellency in him, experienced such comfort from him, and so entirely depended on him for salvation; that they were prepared to renounce every thing, even life itself, rather than come short of an interest in him. Or, "to them there was honor," as opposed to the shame before mentioned (6).—But, on the other hand, those who continued disobedient, (among whom were the Jewish rulers, scribes, and priests, the supposed builders of the temple,) constituted an awful accomplishment of another scripture. (Notes, Ps. 118:19-24. Matt. 21:40-44.) Notwithstanding their proud and obstinate rejection of Christ and their opposition to him, he was made "the Head of the Corner;" but they stumbled and were broken on Him as "a Rock of offence," who was to believers a Refuge and a "Rock of salvation." This was the effect of their unbelief, and disobedience to the promised Messiah; to which they had been appointed in the righteous judgment of God, who purposed to leave them to their prejudice, pride, and enmity, and to glorify himself in their punishment, as it was evident by the prophecies fulfilled in that event. (Notes, Is. 6:9,10. 8:12-15. Rom. 11:7-15.)

10 Which in time past <sup>r</sup> were not a people, but are now the people of God: which had not <sup>s</sup> obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy.

Note.—"A chosen generation," referring to the choice of Abraham and his posterity: "a royal priesthood;" referring to the covenants with Aaron as to the priesthood, and with David as to the kingdom; and "a holy nation, a peculiar people," referring to the national covenant with Israel, at the giving of the law. (Ex. 19:6. Sept.)—To explain all this, as some do, with great labor and learning, to mean that nominal Christians are, exactly in the same sense, "a chosen generation, &c." as Israel was of old; is a most unreasonable confusion of the typical prophecies contained in the Old Testament, with the accomplishment of them in the "true Israel," or the whole body of true believers, as addressed in the New Testament: and to admit it, would subvert the whole system of interpretation, adopted throughout this work; and which, on mature reflection, even on the objections of opponents, the author is daily more and more assured is the only true one. (Notes, Rom. 9:6-18. 11:1-6. Gal. 3:6-14,26-29. 4:21-31. Heb. 12:18-21.) He would not indeed notice these interpretations; but from a fear, lest it should be thought, that he had not duly considered what men, eminent for learning, had said against that exposition, which he decidedly adheres to.—Israel, as typically "a chosen generation;" was cast off from being the peculiar people of God: but Christians, as the spiritual seed of Abraham, and as born again in consequence of their election in Christ, and "accustomed to him for a generation," are indeed

"a chosen generation." (Notes, Ps. 22:30,31. Is. 53:9,10. Eph. 1:3—12.) A small company of Israel, compared with the whole nation, officiated as priests, and they were not of the same tribe to which the kingdom was allotted: but in Christ the kingly and priestly offices are united; (Notes, Zech. 6:12,13. Heb. 7:1) and through him believers become "a royal priesthood," both "kings and priests," being every way dignified and made honorable, called to exercise a spiritual dominion over those passions to which others are enslaved, and to obtain victories over Satan, the world, and sin; and appointed heirs of the kingdom of heaven. They also constituted "a holy nation," incorporated under the government of Christ, subject to his holy laws, sanctified by his Spirit, conformed to his image, and safe under his protection; and "a peculiar people," purchased with the blood of Christ, redeemed from worse than Egyptian bondage, favored with peculiar privileges, and formed to a peculiar character and conduct. (Note, Tit. 2:14.)—In all these respects Christians are appointed to show forth the praises of the Lord, by their spiritual worship, their open profession of his gospel, their holy conversation, and exemplary conduct. To this, therefore, the apostle earnestly exhorted his brethren. The Lord had called many of them out of the total darkness of Pagan idolatry; and the rest, from the comparative darkness of the Mosaic dispensation and Jewish formality, into the clear light of the gospel, to behold the "marvellous" displays thus given of the divine glory, and to partake of his astonishing love to sinners. This he had done, in order that they might be his witnesses and worshippers, to render him the glory due to his name; and to "show forth his praises," or to declare his virtues, or energies, even the efficacy of his grace, in their holy tempers and actions. They had formerly been a people of no name, or excellency; but they were now become "the people of God;" and had "obtained that mercy" for the pardon of their sins, and the salvation of their souls, to which they once were strangers. The prophecy, thus referred to, being quoted by St. Paul, as expressly predicting the calling of the Gentiles, evidently shows that the Jewish converts were not here exclusively addressed. 11 Dearly beloved, <sup>s</sup> I beseech you, <sup>t</sup> as strangers and pilgrims, <sup>u</sup> abstain from fleshly lusts, which <sup>x</sup> war against the soul; themselves "as strangers and pilgrims," who were journeying through a distant land to their heavenly inheritance; (Notes, 1:1,2,17—21. Heb. 11:13—16.) and to "abstain from fleshly lusts," and not allow themselves to hanker after any unlawful, inexpedient, or inordinate animal pleasures, much less to indulge in them; but to keep at a distance from all sensuality, and to bridle and restrain all their appetites, and inure them to subjection; as well as to avoid all other carnal desires after things forbidden, or any earthly object. For such "lusts warred against the soul," to the destruction of immense multitudes: nay, they warred against the souls of Christians; and by their strivings against the spirit, or the regenerate part, and their temporary prevalence in their affections and conduct, often greatly wounded and weakened them.—Covetousness, pride, envy, and other aspiring and malignant passions, as much militate against the salvation of men's souls, and oppose the believer's growth in grace, as sensual propensities can do; "they war against the soul;" and are numbered by the apostle Paul among "the works of the flesh." (Note, Gal. 5:19—21.) It cannot therefore be proper to explain the words of St. Peter restrictively of the animal appetites, as warring against the rational powers of the soul. The whole "natural man" is depraved, the seat of sin is in the soul, and the body is only "the instrument of unrighteousness." (Notes, Gen. 6:5. 8:20—22. Jer. 17:9,10. Matt. 15:15—20. Mark 7:22. Rom. 6:12,13,16—19.) And, in the regenerate, the conflict is not between the body and the soul; but between the new and the old nature, called "the flesh and the spirit:" (Notes, Rom. 7:15—25. Gal. 5:16—18.) "Warring against the soul" relates to the destructive tendency of fleshly lusts, the indulgence of which, in any way, is hostile to the soul, and wars against its salvation, or its peace, purity, and vigor.

Note.—It was incumbent on Christians to maintain an honorable and becoming conversation, in all respects, among their Gentile neighbors: that whereas these, through enmity against God and true religion, and ignorant prejudices, were led to invent and propagate slanders concerning them, as evil-doers, or malefactors guilty of crimes injurious to society, because they would not join with them in the established idolatry; Christians might silence their calumnies, and soften their prejudices, by their evident and abundant "good works." Thus their example, in the presence of their enemies, would concur with the preaching of the gospel, in promoting the conversion of the Gentiles; and "in the day of their visitation," when the Lord should please to call them also by his grace, to glorify his name, the holy lives of his people would be owned as the means of

Note.—(Notes, Rom. 13:1—7. Tit. 3:1,2.) The words, rendered “every ordinance of man,” may signify every human constitution or form of government. God has appointed magistracy as his ordinance, for the peace and good order of society; but the peculiar form of government is left to human prudence, under the direction of Providence. So that Christians are required to submit to that government, which is established in the countries where they severally reside; without attempting any alteration, except in a peaceable and legal manner, according to their rank in the community. The apostle wrote when Nero was the Roman emperor; but he was led to use the more general name of “king,” as his epistle was intended for the use of future ages and every country. This savage tyrant, who was at length put to death as the enemy of mankind, but not till he had slain multitudes of Christians by his persecuting cruelty, and among the rest the apostles Peter and Paul, as it is generally supposed, was the “supreme,” whom Christians must submit to and honor! And the governors of provinces, deputed by him and the Roman senate, together with other subordinate magistrates, must also be obeyed. The intention of civil government is “to punish evil-doers;” and to protect and “honor those who do well;” and, in general, the administration, even at that time, would be productive of immense good, compared with lawless anarchy; though in very many things the end of government was doubtless counteracted; for which the rulers would be accountable to the Judge of the world. In this way the duty of kings and rulers also was pointed out to them. But in respect of Christians, it was expressly “the will of God,” that, by their good behavior, “in all godliness and honesty,” as peaceable subjects, notwithstanding the oppression which they suffered, they might “put to silence the ignorant” slanders “of foolish” and wicked men, who reviled them as seditious persons and enemies to the state, because they would worship “the one living and true God” alone, and not join in any idolatry. They ought indeed to consider themselves “as free” from the ceremonial law, from condemnation, from Satan's yoke, and from human impositions in respect of the worship of God; yet they must by no means use their liberty to veil “maliciousness,” to cover over any sinister and selfish designs, or to find a pretence for gratifying revenge, on those who had injured them; but in all things to act “as the servants of God,” in willing obedience to his commandments, which formed the most perfect liberty which could be enjoyed. (Notes, 1 Cor. 7:17—24. Gal. 5:13—15. 1 Tim. 6:1—5.) Let them therefore, in obedience to God, and for his glory, show respect and honor to all men, according to their rank and authority in society, and not scruple the customary tokens of subjection in things lawful: let them at the same time reserve their special love for the brotherhood, or their fellow Christians; and, whilst they feared, worshipped, and revered God supremely, let them “honor the king,” as far as it consisted with their other duty. (Note, Matt. 22:15—22.)—It is almost impossible, that there can be a worse supreme Governor, than he who ruled the vast Roman empire, when this was written by divine inspiration.—The comprehensive brevity of the closing verse, has been greatly and justly admired by competent judges.

Netc.—(Notes, Eph. 6:5—9. Col. 3:22—25. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. Tit. 2:9,10.) The apostle Peter exhorted servants to obedience, even in stronger language, than his beloved brother Paul had done. These were generally slaves, and many of them to heathen masters, who used them very cruelly. The word here used, signifies domestics, who being more constantly under the eye of their masters, than slaves employed in cultivating the land, are supposed to have suffered more from their violent passions. Yet the apostle directed them to be "subject to their masters with all fear;" with a respectful regard to them, as placed over them by Providence, and with a fear of offending or dishonoring God. This conduct should be observed, not only to such masters as were "good and humane," and who would be pleased on reasonable terms, and mild even when offended; "but also to the froward" and morose, who would be angry without cause, and use severity when displeased. For it would be grace, or the effect and evidence of grace, "acceptable to God" and worthy of man's commendation, if from a conscientious regard to the authority and will of God, they patiently and meekly endured such treatment, as was grievous to be borne; when not having been faulty they were unjustly punished. Indeed, "what glory," or honorable distinction, could it be, for professed Christians to be patient, when they were beaten, or scourged for their faults, seeing many of the Gentile slaves submitted quietly in this case? But if they behaved well, and were beaten by their proud and passionate heathen masters; and yet bore it, without peevish complaints or purposes of revenge, still persevering in meek endeavors to do their duty; this indeed would "be acceptable with God," and rewarded by him as a distinguishing effect of his grace. (Notes, Matt. 5:43—48. Luke 6:27—36.) For Christians were especially "called" thus to do good to all men, and to endure ill usage from them; and still to proceed with alacrity in doing well, amidst ingratitude, revilings, and injuries, without being wearied out by any kind or degree of evil done to them: "because Christ," when he suffered in their stead, "left them," in this and in all other respects, "an example, that they should follow his steps;" that by contemplating the same Object to which they looked for pardon and righteousness, they might learn how to act in the most trying circumstances. (Note, Heb. 12:2, 3.) He indeed, had "done no sin" in any degree; and perfect wisdom, love, and holiness were displayed in all his works; nor was there any guile in his words: so that the contempt, malice, and cruelty, with which he met, were base returns for the greatest kindnesses, and the most unworthy treatment of consummate excellency. Yet "when he was reviled," as if guilty of the most atrocious crimes, he did not retort the reproachful language, though most justly deserved by his enemies: and even "when he suffered" all kinds of indignities and tortures, till they terminated in his death on the cross, he did not so much as "threaten" his crucifiers, though all power was vested in him. On the contrary he prayed for them, saying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" and thus he "committed himself to him who judged righteously," and left him to justify his character, plead his cause, and punish his enemies. This example Christians were peculiarly bound to consider and imitate; because the Lord Jesus, when he thus suffered, acted as their holy and divine Surety; and, pitying their misery, when they deserved and were exposed to the wrath of God, he voluntarily "bare" the guilt and punishment of "their sins," as imputed to him, and expiated them by his death "on the tree," or cross; in order that through his grace, and the encouragements of his gospel they might become "dead to sin," and separated from it, and so "live unto righteousness," as the obedient servants of God. (Notes, 3:17,18. Is. 53:7—12. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Gal. 3:8—14.) Thus, through the ignominious stripes, which he (holy and glorious as he was,) willingly endured for them, and by the scars of those wounds, which he received for their sakes, the diseases of their souls were healed; which were far worse than the livid marks left on their bodies, from the cruel scourgings inflicted on them, in which they were conformed to their divine Lord (Notes, Is. 53:4—6. Matt. 27:26—31.) The consideration of his scourgings, and livid scars, was suited in the most affecting manner, to reconcile the poor slaves, while suffering under the cruel usage of their masters, to their hard lot; when their Redeemer, the holy Jesus, the Lord of glory, had thus suffered for their salvation. These things indeed related to all Christians, though especially addressed to slaves; for all without exception had been "as sheep going astray, and must have fallen a prey to "the roaring lion which sought to devour" their souls: (Note, 5:8,9.) but they had been sought out by, and "brought back," or converted to, the good Shepherd, who laid down his life for the sheep. ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The apostles, with one consent, declare the necessity of "laying aside all malice, guile, hypocrisies, envies, and slanders," in order to "receive with meekness" the instructions of Christ. We need not then wonder, that there are so many hearers of the word wholly unfruitful; and that others are so little edified; when we observe how much these apostolical injunctions are neglected. But let those, who are as "new-born infants" in the family of God, but have "tasted that the Lord is gracious," avoid all such as would mislead them into controversies, which are commonly conducted with malice, envy, deceit, and detraction; and let them beware of "all hypocrisy;" that so the health of their souls may be preserved, a vitiated appetite prevented, and a relish of the holy word of God increased. They ought also to attend primarily to the more simple and easy parts of divine truth, which is the proper milk for young converts: that so, "growing by it" to maturity of judgment, experience, and grace, they may at length be able to digest the more difficult doctrines; which are suitable food for those who are of full age, and which will never be given to new-born babes, by those who know how "rightly to divide the word of truth." (Notes, 2 Tim. 2:14—18. Heb. 5:11—14.)—But let no man rest in unexperienced notions: for even "babes in Christ taste that he is gracious;" and their experience of his love and mercy draws them to seek him, in all their subsequent distresses, fears, wants, and temptations, and to rest on him as "the Foundation" of all their hopes. Thus they are daily "coming to him," and are builded on him, "as living stones to be a spiritual house;" and consecrated by him as "a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God" through him: for true religion consists of doctrine, experience, and practice; and he, who attempts to separate these, takes the ready way of destroying the whole.—As the Lord has laid "this chief Corner-stone, elect, precious," to be the Foundation of his living temple; those who are taught to come to him, and rest their hopes on him, will surely be safe and happy: for the whole scripture declares, that "he who believeth on him shall never be ashamed." But whilst our Emmanuel, and his salvation, are glorious in the eyes and "precious" to the hearts of all the regenerate, who deem it their chief honor to belong to him and serve him; men in general, continuing proud, carnal, and alienated from God, can see no comeliness or glory in them. (Note, Is. 53:2,3. John 1:14. 15:22—25.) He is indeed made "the Head-Stone of the corner;" but modern builders in general make no account of him: and many carry on their work, either in open opposition to him, or in manifest neglect of him. Thus they "stumble at the word, being disobedient;" and will perish more dreadfully than if he had never come to be the Saviour of sinners; "whereunto also they were appointed."—But let us inquire, whether we have the obedient faith of those to whom "Christ is precious:" for many profess his truths, who stumble at his precepts; and so in another way he becomes to them "a Rock of offence," and an occasion of deeper condemnation.

V. 9—17.

Happy are they, of whom it may truly be said, "Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people!" If we aspire at these distinctions, let us be "followers of God as dear children;" let us abound in "spiritual sacrifices," and be careful to act up to the dignity and sanctity of our royal and priestly character, in all the concerns of life: let us obey the holy laws of Christ our King, and seek his honor, in connexion with the peace and prosperity of our fellow-subjects; and let us be careful to appear as "a peculiar people, zealous of good works," (Note, Tit. 2:14.) whose great business it is, "to show forth the praises of God, who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light." Thus we shall best evince that these blessings belong to us, and shall make the most suitable returns for them. Most of us well know and remember, that once we "were not a people" devoted to the Lord, nor had we sought and "obtained mercy" from him: how vast then are our obligations to him, who has made us his people, and shown mercy to us! It becomes us therefore "as strangers and pilgrims to abstain from" all kinds of fleshly lusts, which continually "war against the souls" of men: nor can a believer, in any instance or degree indulge them, without being wounded, weakened, defiled, and injured.—But we should consider, not only our own comfort and advantages: the honor of the gospel, and the conversion of our neighbors, likewise demand our attention. Let us then study to "have our conversation honest" and honorable amidst our enemies and slanderers; that, whereas they "revile us as evil doers," our evident "good works" may refute their slanders, and be the means, if the Lord please, of bringing them also to believe in him, and to glorify his name. (Note 3:1—7.) For if we, who "had not obtained mercy have at length obtained mercy;" why may not they, who still remain ignorant and prejudiced, be made partakers of the same salvation?—With this intent, and from other evangelical motives, we should "submit to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake;" obeying the king, and all placed in authority under him; praying for them, that they may have wisdom and grace to be faithful to their important trust, (Notes, 1 Tim. 2:1—4.) and for the preservation of our most excellent constitution; and endeavoring, as "the quiet in the land," by "well-doing to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men: as free," with that liberty which the Son of God bestows through the Holy Spirit; (Notes, John 8:30—36. Rom. 6:16—23.) but remembering that we are "the servants of God," and must in no degree use our liberty to cloke any malicious or ambitious designs. By thus honoring all men, loving our brethren, fearing God, and honoring the king; we shall best adorn the gospel, and most experience its comfort.

The view given by the apostle, of the behavior of many masters to their offending slaves, may serve to convince us, how incompatible slavery is with the "love of our neighbors," and animate us to protest, in all proper ways, against so grievous an oppression of our fellow creatures: yet Christianity, among its other unparalleled excellencies, teaches men to behave honorably, and live comfortably, even in these circumstances of degradation and suffering. But if slaves, when thus unjustly and cruelly used, were directed to submit to their masters and respect them; how inexcusable are those hired servants, who, professing the gospel, do not "obey good and gentle masters!" who can endure no degree of "frowardness" in others, through the indulgence of it in themselves; and who will not bear a reproof, when they are most evidently culpable! Indeed, this alone would be no evidence of grace or acceptable obedience, though it would be far better than "answering again:" but when, in any situation, "we do well, and" then "suffer" rebuke or ill usage "patiently, from conscience towards God," we manifest the reality of our grace, ensure a bounteous recompense, and have the honor of resembling our blessed Lord: and servants to unconverted masters, who without cause injure and revile them, should rejoice in showing whose followers they are. Indeed, we cannot go through with our duty, as Christians in any station, if we do not persevere in endeavoring to "overcome evil with good," copying the conduct of him who "suffered for us, and left us an example that we should follow his steps." Our sufferings and reproaches can neither be so unmerited nor so great as his were; who "when he was reviled, reviled not again;" who suffered without threatening, and "committed himself to him that judgeth righteously." As therefore "he, his own self, bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we being dead to sin might live unto righteousness," and that "by his stripes our souls might be healed;" and as we all "were as sheep going astray," till divine grace brought us back to "the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls;" let us learn to copy his example, when reviled and abused; as well as to rely on his merits, and keep close under his gracious protection and guidance to the end of our pilgrimage.

CHAP. III.

Exhortations to wives and husbands, concerning their respective duties, 1—7; and to all Christians to live in amity, to forgive injuries, to be constant under persecutions, to profess and defend the truth with meekness; and to maintain a good conscience enforced by the nature of their calling, their privileges, and the example of Christ, 8—18. The case of those to whom Christ, by his Spirit in Noah, had preached, who yet perished in the deluge; and that of Noah and his family saved in the ark: an emblem of the destruction of the wicked, and the salvation of those, who had not only the sign of baptism, but the thing signified by it, through a risen and glorified Redeemer, 18—22.

Note.—(Note, Eph. 5:22—33.) The apostle next gave directions, concerning the duties of wives and husbands, as a matter of great importance to the credit and success of the gospel. In general, wives were commanded to be "subject to their own husbands:" and even those who were married to Gentiles, or other unbelievers, whether they had been converted since their marriage, or had sinfully brought themselves into so trying a situation, ought to obey this commandment in all things lawful. (Notes, Gen. 3:16. 1 Cor. 7:10—14. 11:2—16.) This must be attended to in a conscientious manner: not only in order to lighten their own trial, and to “adorn the gospel,” but with an especial aim at the conversion of their husbands; (Note, 1 Cor. 7:15,16.) which was not so much to be expected from a disputatious attempt to teach them the gospel, as from the silent persuasive eloquence of a becoming deportment. Thus the wives might hope to win upon those, who “did not obey the word,” but treated it with contempt or neglect; as the constant, obliging, amiable conduct, and prudent discourse of such near relatives would tend to soften their prejudices, and conciliate their affections; and so induce them to pay attention to the preaching of the gospel. For it would have a considerable tendency to their conviction, habitually to witness and experience the excellent effects of Christianity, in the chaste, modest, and faithful conduct of their wives; as united with respectful fear of disobliging or grieving them, and reverential regard to the authority and commands of God. In this endeavor, they must not deem outward things, such as “plaiting the hair, wearing” golden rings and bracelets, or “putting on” elegant or becoming garments, to be “their adorning,” in any degree: but they must value and seek for an inward beauty, residing in the heart, as “a hidden man,” visible in its essence only unto God, consisting of a renewal and sanctification of the whole soul to the divine image, through “the incorruptible seed of the word,” made effectual by the power of the Holy Spirit: for this alone would continue for ever, without decaying, or being tarnished. (Note, 1 Tim. 2:9,10.) This inward beauty and ornament of a sanctified heart would especially be manifested by “a meek and quiet spirit,” which was “in the sight of God” very valuable; and he would certainly honor it, though men might undervalue it. Indeed, it would be their best ornament in the sight of their husbands, and do far more to fix their affections and excite their esteem; than the studied decorations of becoming or fashionable apparel, attended by a froward and contentious temper. (Notes, Ps. 25:8,9. 37:10,11. 149:4. Is. 61:1—3. Matt. 5:5. Luke 4:16—19.)—Outward ornaments, according to every one’s rank in life, are not absolutely prohibited by these scriptures, as it has been generally observed: but the frivolous affectation and vanity, which constitute the love of finery; the time, attention, and expense wasted by those, who are attached to such decorations; and the proportionable neglect of the “inward adorning,” which is uniformly connected with it, sufficiently prove, that the more moderate and indifferent about these embellishments Christians are, from proper principles, and without preciseness and censoriousness, the more respectable and amiable they must appear in the eyes of all competent judges.—“The works of charity, performed to the distressed, with the money necessary for purchasing ornaments of gold and costly attire, will render women much more beautiful in the eyes of God and man, than if they were decked with all the vain ornaments, in which the lighter part of the sex delight.” Macknight.

6 Even <sup>q</sup> as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord: whose * daughters ye are, as long as ye do well, <sup>r</sup> and are not afraid with any amazement.

Note.—The internal ornaments, which the apostle recommended, had been of repute in the church, from the most remote antiquity; for thus “holy women of old time, who trusted in” the promises of “God,” and were partakers in his salvation, had “adorned themselves;” not counting either their personal beauty, or their costly garments, “their adorning;” but in “the meekness of wisdom” they willingly obeyed God, by being in subjection to their own husbands. Thus Sarah, the honored mother of the nation of Israel, had “obeyed Abraham;” and, in token of her respect for his person, and the authority which God had vested in him, she was used to “call him, lord.”—It is remarkable, that in the instance, where this is recorded, Sarah expressed such unbelief respecting the promise of God, that she was sharply rebuked for it; yet that is here passed over, and the only good word, which she spoke on this occasion, is mentioned to her commendation. (Note, Gen. 18:9—12.) This shows how readily the Lord pardons the sins, and how graciously he accepts the poor services of the upright.—Many of the Christian women, whom Peter addressed, were descended from Abraham and Sarah; and the others would be accounted as her daughters, heirs of her faith, and imitators of her example, so long as they behaved well in their relative duties, and as it became the disciples of Christ: and were not so afraid of the anger of their husbands, or of others, as to deny him, or act contrary to his commandments, through unbelief and consternation of spirit. For this would be rather an imitation of Sarah, when, through surprise, she denied that she laughed; than of her faith and holiness, or her becoming subjection to her husband.

unto the wife, as unto the weaker vessel, and as being <sup>u</sup> heirs together of the grace of life; <sup>x</sup> that your prayers be not hindered.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—On the other hand, the apostle exhorted “husbands,” professing the gospel, to “dwell with” their wives, in a rational and intelligent manner, which might evince the propriety of the authority being conferred on them. They ought to behave towards them, as became those who had the knowledge of God and of true religion; who understood the ends for which marriage was appointed, and the manner in which pious persons ought to behave in that holy estate: and this would keep them from every thing unbecoming, unkind, unfaithful, or injurious to their temporal comfort, or spiritual improvement. As their wives were of the same nature, and conjoined in the most endeared and indissoluble union, which blended all their interests with those of their husbands: so the consideration of their inferiority in this relation, and the comparative weakness of their sex, which rendered them incapable of so great hardship and fatigue as men could endure; together with their manifold infirmities, as connected with child-bearing, should induce their husbands to treat them with the greater respect, and more tender regard; instead of exciting them to tyrannize over them. They ought therefore to show a peculiar esteem and affection for them; to take much satisfaction in their company; to honor them before servants and strangers; to support their credit in the family; to make a becoming provision for their wants, to lay no unreasonable injunctions upon them; and to show a great concern in every thing relative to their health, comfort, and reputation. And, if they would be thought superior in knowledge or wisdom, they ought to show it, by not taking offence at trifles, and by giving up their own humors and inclinations, to oblige their wives, and for their welfare. These things should be attended to, from the consideration that they were “fellow-heirs of the grace of life,” or of the free favor and gift of God, which is eternal life; and therefore, as companions in their pilgrimage, they ought to do all, which they possibly could, to solace, counsel, and assist each other by the way. They should also more attentively guard against all disagreements and domestic uneasiness; that nothing might occur to indispose them for prayer, in secret, and in the family, but especially with each other. This, being essential to the Christian’s prosperity, was a matter of so great importance, that all things, in his whole conduct, ought to be regulated with reference to it.—Perhaps it might also be intimated, that in case a Christian had an unconverted wife, he ought to study by kind behavior to conciliate her mind; that so she might do nothing to interrupt the social worship of the family, but might be induced amicably to join in it.

Note.—(Notes, 2:13—25. Rom. 12:9—21. 1 Cor. 1:4—9. 13:4—7. Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 2:1—4.) These exhortations entirely coincide with those, which have been considered in St. Paul’s epistles.—As the conclusion and substance of all his admonitions, the apostle exhorted Christians, to be “of one mind” and judgment, as far as possible, in the great concerns of religion; to sympathize with each other in their personal trials and sorrows, and to rejoice in each other’s comforts; to bear a brotherly affection to all their fellow Christians; to compassionate the miseries, and relieve the wants, of their unbelieving neighbors; to be friendly, obliging, affable, accessible, and condescending to inferiors, in their whole conduct; endeavoring to conciliate the affections of all men, by every kind of civility and concession, as far as could consist with their other duties: and by no means retaliating injuries, or retorting revilings; but, on the contrary, blessing, and praying for, their contumelious and malicious enemies, and speaking kindly to them. (Notes, Matt. 5:43—48. Luke 6:27—36. 1 Thes. 5:12—15.) In doing this, they might be encouraged and influenced, by the consideration, that God had graciously “called them,” from being his enemies, and exposed to the awful curse of his law, by the grace of his gospel, “to inherit a blessing,” in time and to eternity. (Note, Gal. 3:6—14.) They ought, therefore, to copy his love, who had “overcome evil with good” in his dealings with them; and to pity the misery and blindness, rather than resent the injuries, of their enemies, who could not possibly deprive them of their felicity.

This accorded to the advice given to young persons by the Psalmist. (Notes, Ps. 34:11—14.) For if any man desired to prolong his days, and live comfortably on earth, or to possess the hope of eternal life in heaven; he must learn to “bridle his tongue,” from all wicked, abusive, or deceitful words; (Notes, Jam. 1: 26. 3:1—12.) to forsake and depart far from all evil actions; to do all the good he could; to “seek peace with all men,” and pursue it though it fled from him. (Note, Heb. 12:14.) For the omniscient and omnipresent God “watched over the righteous,” and would take care of them; (Notes, 2 Chr. 16:7—10. Ps. 103:15—18.) and he was ever ready to hear and answer their prayers: but he “set himself,” as a frowning Judge, and an omnipotent Adversary, against all impenitent sinners.—He that will love. (10) The quotation is from the Septuagint, which well translates the Hebrew, except as the apostle uses the third person, instead of the second.

Note.—The apostle, with great animation, next demanded, who could or would harm them, if they copied the example of him, who is essential and perfect goodness; and were imitators of him, who did good to others, as an imitator of Christ. (Note, 1 Cor. 11:1.) In this case none could do them real harm; and this inoffensive, upright, and benevolent conduct would generally, in time, disarm the enmity of their neighbors. But sometimes it would not be so; as Satan would attempt to instigate the natural enmity of men's hearts against the gospel, and, by connecting it with the ambition, jealousy, resentment, political interest, or bigotry of rulers, to persecute the church. If therefore they should be called to “suffer for righteousness' sake,” they ought to deem this a peculiar honor and happiness. (Notes, 4:12—16. Matt. 5:10—12. Luke 6:21—23.) Nor ought they to be dismayed at the rage, menaces, decrees, and power of their persecutors, which were “their terror;” but which could at most only “kill the body,” and could not so much as touch that without the permission of God. (Notes, Matt. 10:24—31.) They ought not therefore to be so troubled about these matters, as by confusion of mind to be unfit for their duty, or in danger of listening to temptations and denying Christ; as the apostle himself had done on one occasion. (Note, Matt. 26:69—75.)—To avoid this they ought to “sanctify the Lord God in their hearts,” maintaining honorable thoughts of his perfections, reverencing his name, fearing nothing so much as his displeasure, and trusting their souls, lives, liberty, possessions, reputations, and families in his hands, as in a Sanctuary, and a strong Tower. (Note, Is. 8:11—15.)—Instead therefore of renouncing or concealing their religion; they were exhorted to be, at all times, ready and prepared “to give an answer,” to defend the cause of truth, and to show its excellency and authority, to “every man who asked a reason of the hope that was in them;” whether he were a magistrate, or a private person, and whatever motives induced him to the inquiry. As Christians, they hoped in God through Christ for eternal life; and in this confidence they renounced present advantages, and exposed themselves to most grievous sufferings. What therefore was the ground and “reason of their hope?” This question they should be prepared to answer, by showing the conclusive evidences which demonstrated that Christianity was from God; its grand design; the need men have of forgiveness and sanctification; the nature of redemption by the blood of Christ, and of the new creation of the Spirit unto obedience; and the promises, security, and seal of the new covenant. Thus they might evince from the authenticated word of God, and their own experience of its effects, and the influence which it had on their conduct, that they hoped for happiness on reasonable grounds; and acted wisely in renouncing, venturing, and suffering all things for the sake of it.—But cogent arguments alone would not suffice in this testimony: they must also speak “with meekness,” or modesty, humility, calmness, and love; “and fear;” or a reverence for God and heavenly things, and a cautious guard over their own spirits, lest their mismanagement should disgrace the cause of the truth. And they must also “have a good conscience,” purged from the discouragement of guilt by the blood of Christ, that they might be satisfied as to the event; and as an enlightened monitor directing them in all holy conduct: (Notes, Acts 24:10—21. 1 Cor. 4:3—5. 2 Cor. 1:12—14. Heb. 9:11—14. 13:18,19.) that so, their persecutors, who treated them as malefactors, might be ashamed of thus falsely ac-

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Nature would be most ready to repine or rage at undeserved sufferings: (Note, 2:18—25.) yet, in fact, if God were pleased so to appoint, it was far more desirable, honorable, comfortable, and profitable, to “suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing;” as all the guilt would in this case belong to the persecutors, and all the advantage would wholly accrue to the sufferers. (Notes, 4:12—16. 2 Thes. 1:5—10.) Thus likewise they would be conformed to Christ, who “once suffered;” being falsely accused of men as an evil-doer, and treated by them with all possible cruelty and insult: but he, “the just one,” being perfectly righteous, was made a Sacrifice “for sin, instead of the unrighteous;” having no sin of his own, and yet “suffering for sin,” it was evident he suffered for the sins of others. (Notes, Is. 53:4—12. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Gal. 3:6—14. 1 John 2:1,2.) This he submitted to, from gratuitous and unspeakable love; that he might bring rebels, enemies, and condemned sinners “unto God,” as pardoned, reconciled, sanctified, and made friends and children; that they might be happy for ever in his favor; and that he might be glorified in their salvation, and by their worship and services. For “the righteous” Saviour having been thus “put to death in the flesh,” in respect of his human nature, on the charge of blasphemy; was speedily “quickened,” or raised from the dead, by the power of the Holy Spirit, and thus declared to be the Son of God, as he had avowed that he was.—The resurrection of Christ is sometimes ascribed to God or the Father, sometimes to Christ himself, and sometimes to the Holy Spirit. This is very easy and natural, if Father, Son, and Spirit are one God: but how can it be explained on any other principle?—The case is the same in many other things. (Marg. Ref.)

Note.—It need not be thought wonderful, that so many refused to believe in the risen and glorified Saviour, through the preaching of his apostles, aided by the Holy Spirit; as the case had been the same of old. For Christ, as God, and with reference to his future incarnation, had gone, by his Spirit, (Note, 1:10—13.) inspiring his servant Noah, to denounce the approaching deluge, and preach repentance to that incorrigible generation, who perished in their sins, and were in “the prison” of hell, (that is, the adults among them,) when the apostle wrote; being confined there till the judgment of the great day. For they had “sometime been disobedient” and unbelieving, (Note, 2:7,8.) even during the hundred and twenty years of God’s long suffering, after the deluge was predicted, but before it was sent. At that time Noah was occupied in preparing the ark, “showing his faith by his works,” and calling them to repent and seek mercy from God. (Notes, Gen. 6: 7: Matt. 24:36—41. Heb. 11:7. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.) But they unanimously and obstinately rejected his message; and thus they were destroyed by the flood; whilst only eight persons had their lives preserved in the ark, being delivered from the waters and carried above them: so that the floods, which drowned all others, without exception, concurred in their deliverance.—Various other interpretations have been given of this passage; but none of them appears to me in the least degree satisfactory.

22 Who <sup>d</sup> is gone into heaven, and <sup>e</sup> is on the right hand of God: <sup>f</sup> angels, and authorities, and powers being made subject unto him.

Note.—“The like figure,” or the antitype of Noah and his family’s preservation in the ark and by the water, at that time saved Christians, even “baptism.” Christ is the true Ark. His church is within the ark, and is therefore safe; but all without will be swept by the deluge of divine vengeance into destruction. Into this ark men enter by faith; this faith Jews and Gentiles professed, when by baptism they were admitted into the Christian church; and thus the baptismal water formed as it were the sign of their safety. Yet it was not “the washing away the filth of the flesh,” or the mere outward administration of baptism, however rightly done; not the outward sign, the opus operatum, which could effect this, unless it were also rightly received. It was, therefore, “the answer of a good conscience towards God,” which saved; namely, when a man, by regeneration of the Spirit, was able to profess repentance, faith, and purposes of a new life, uprightly, and as in the presence of God; and sincerely to answer such questions as were put to persons on those occasions. (Rom. 10:5—11.) When Jews and Gentiles professed Christianity, they were thus received into the church, exactly in the same manner as Gentiles had been into the Jewish church by circumcision: but the argument, concerning the baptism of infants, born of Christian parents, is not at all affected by it. The apostle spoke of baptism, as the initiatory ordinance of Christianity: but he took care to remind men, that the inward grace of baptism, even regeneration, from which all holy affections and actions spring, alone could introduce them into the true church, the Ark or real security; and that no outward administration of baptism could effect this blessed translation into the kingdom of the Son of God.—This salvation of believers was the effect of “the resurrection of Christ,” which evidenced the acceptance of his sacrifice, and made way for his exaltation in heavenly glory; that he might confer as a Sovereign, by his power and through his intercession, the blessings which he had purchased by the shedding of his blood. (Notes, Eph. 1:15—23. 4:7—13. Phil. 2:9—11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The truths, precepts, and grace of the gospel teach men a becoming and beneficial behavior, in all the relations of life, by a happy union of piety, purity, meekness, fidelity, and holy love; and form them to it.—Every person ought to use all proper means, with earnestness and perseverance, for the conversion of such “as obey not the word,” especially among relations; and to aim habitually at gaining others to Christ, by every part of his conduct: but an obliging conscientious performance of their respective duties, by inferiors, will go furthest with superiors, and win most upon them. For when they see, that religion teaches their wives, children, and servants, to behave better towards them, than they formerly did; it interests their feelings, and shows them, that there is an excellency in what produces such happy effects: and it is greatly to be wished, that there were more, who thus enforced genuine Christianity, in every station, employment, and relation of life. (Note, Tit. 2:9,10.)—The inward and incorruptible adorning of wisdom and grace; shining forth “in a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price,” constitutes the most durable beauty and amiableness, and will ensure esteem and affection, when all outward ornaments, (the memorial of our sin and shame,) with all that beauty which they are vainly meant to embellish, will not secure any one from contempt and aversion, whose conduct in life is disgraceful: and they will soon leave the poor body to the confinement and corruption of the tomb; and the soul, which is “without holiness,” to be for ever loathsome and abhorred of God. Let then all, who would be the followers and daughters of the “holy women, who of old trusted in God,” copy their fashion, seek their ornaments, attend to relative duties, do good, fear nothing but sin, and beware of every thing which might betray them into it. And let husbands, professing the gospel, act towards their wives, with that prudent and tender regard, which becomes those, who know the word of God; which may ensure to them respect from domestics and all around them, and tend to render them comfortable under their various infirmities. Thus husbands and wives will be enabled to live together, “as fellow-heirs of the grace of life,” and nothing will hinder their united prayers for a blessing upon each other, upon their children and family, and all who are connected with them.

As peace and love are necessary to domestic comfort, so are they to the prosperity of the church. Christians should therefore study and pray to be “all of one mind, to have compassion one of another, to love as brethren, to be compassionate and courteous:” and, instead of “rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing;” they should “bless their enemies,” after his example, who has called them from their state of enmity “to inherit a blessing.” But ‘how astonishing and lamentable is it, that when the way to happiness is so plainly delineated, so few should find it! What man is there, who does not desire life, and to live many days, that he may see good? Yet how few tongues are kept from evil! How few lips from speaking guile! How few decline from evil, and do good! How few seek peace and pursue it! On the contrary, how much low cunning and artifice; and what discords and contentions reign among mankind! And how detestable and miserable do these ‘perverse and ungovernable passions render us!’ Doddridge.—But happy are the remnant of the righteous! “The eyes of the Lord watch over them, his ears are open” and attentive “to their prayers,” and he delights in doing them good, while he “sets his face against the workers of iniquity.”—Who then can harm those, that are “followers of God as dear children,” and walk in his most holy ways? (Note, Eph. 5:1,2.) Their sufferings, “for righteousness’ sake,” will prove an addition to their felicity: so that, fearing God, making him their Sanctuary, and abiding safe and comfortable under his protection; they need not fear the terror of the wicked, nor “be troubled” by reason of their rage and malice. They should therefore “always be ready to give a reason of their hope,” to inquirers of every description: for it is founded on the most irrefragable arguments; and indeed the true Christian alone can reasonably hope to obtain eternal happiness, or escape eternal misery. Yet in pleading the cause of truth, in public or in private, we should be prepared, not only with conclusive arguments, but “with meekness and fear,” that a humble, benevolent, peaceable conduct towards men, may evidently unite with a reverential awe of the majesty of God: for wrath, pride, bitterness, and irreverence, will prejudice men’s minds against the truth, whatever ability is shown in defending it. Nor can this service be successfully performed, except by those, who “exercise themselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man:” for nothing can be so well opposed to the enmity of the human heart against the truth, as the holy lives of its professors, which tend to make those “ashamed, who falsely accuse their good conversation in Christ." If this, however, cannot be done, "it is better to suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing;" whatever our natural impatience may suggest: for "Christ himself once suffered for sins, the Just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God;" and arose from the dead, to accomplish the most gracious design.

While we recollect the end proposed in the sufferings of the divine Saviour: let us inquire whether we be really brought unto God, as his worshippers, and in the temper of our hearts, and conduct of our lives. For, though his resurrection was attested by the same Spirit, whose divine power effected it; yet few, even to this day, receive him as their Saviour, and flee to him for "refuge from the wrath to come." Nor need we wonder at this, if we consider what a vast majority were disobedient, when Christ, by the same Spirit in believing Noah, preached to the old world, "while the ark was preparing, during the long-suffering of God;" and how few were preserved from the flood: though it may well make us tremble to learn, that the obstinate rebels were cast into prison, never more to be released, as utterly unable "to pay the very last mite." (Note, Matt. 5:25,26.) Let us then enter the Ark, which God has provided, as the only security from the deluge of impending vengeance, which will destroy a guilty world: let us beware that we rest not in outward forms; as if that baptism could save us, which only "washes away the filth of the flesh," or any thing but "the answer of a good conscience towards God." While we profess ourselves the disciples of Christ, and partakers of his grace, let us seek the true baptism of the regenerating and sanctifying Spirit of God, in behalf of our children and friends: and thus let us trust in his merits, power, love, and truth, who died "for our sins and rose again for our justification;" and "who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God, angels, principalities, and powers being made subject to him." (Notes, Heb. 6:16—20. 7:24—28. 9:24—26.)

CHAP. IV.

Exhortations to cease from sin, in conformity to Christ who had suffered for it; and to live holy lives, though reproached for it; in expectation of a future judgment, 1—3; to sobriety, watchfulness, and prayer; because "the end of all things is at hand," 7; and to love, hospitality, and a due improvement of talents, as the stewards of God, and in order to glorify him, 8—11. Encouragements to patience, and confidence in God, amidst persecutions; with cautions and instructions, 12—19.

FORASMUCH then as <sup>a</sup> Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, <sup>b</sup> arm yourselves likewise with the same mind: <sup>c</sup> for he that hath suffered in the flesh hath <sup>d</sup> ceased from sin;

2 That he <sup>e</sup> no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh to <sup>f</sup> the lusts of men, but to <sup>g</sup> the will of God.

Note.—Seeing that Christ, in human nature, and in the likeness of sinful flesh, had suffered with perfect constancy and patience for the sins of his people; (Note, 3:17,18.) his disciples were called on to "arm themselves with the same mind." Thus a resigned, self-denying, meek, steadfast, and intrepid frame of spirit; resulting from confidence in God, love to him, and zeal for his glory; hatred of sin, and realizing views of eternal things, would fortify their minds against despondency, terror, and weariness; and prepare them to resist temptation, and maintain the conflict against the world, the flesh, and the devil, with resolution and vigor, even unto death; being resolved to suffer that last extremity for the sake of Christ, if called to it: whereas without this internal armor, they would surely faint in time of trial. (Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 6:10—20. 1 Thes. 5:4—11.) As therefore Christ had "suffered in the flesh" when crucified once for their sins, but had risen from the dead to die no more, and had thus done with sin as imputed to him; (Notes, Heb. 9:27,28.) so Christians, having "suffered in the flesh," in conformity to Christ, by the mortification of their carnal nature, through his grace and motives derived from his cross, had ceased from the practice of sin, expected no satisfaction from any forbidden indulgence, and were continually employed in resisting the influence of sin in their hearts, and endeavoring to prevent its breaking forth in their lives. (Notes, 2:18—25. Rom. 6:1—11. Gal. 2:17—21. 5:22—26. Col. 3:1—4.)—The end or intention of this renewed judgment and conduct in believers, and of the grace by which the change had been wrought, was, that they "should no longer live the remnant of their time in the flesh," or in the body, "to the lusts of men," or in order to gratify any of those inordinate desires of worldly things, by which men are naturally actuated; but that they should thenceforth "live to the will of God," seeking his favor and glory, and doing his commandments.—The word flesh in these verses, seems to be used in three different senses. It means 1st. The holy human nature of Christ; 2dly. The depraved nature of man, the body of sin and death; and 3dly. The mortal body, in which the soul tabernacles during its continuance in this world.—The contrast between "the lusts of man," and "the will of God," should be noticed.

r that is ready to judge the quick and the dead.

Note.—When the ends, for which men were born into the world, had been duly considered; it would appear to the converts to Christianity, whom the apostle addressed, that “the time past of their lives” might abundantly “suffice to have wrought the will of the Gentiles;” or to have wasted life in committing those sins, and pursuing those objects, to which the ignorant heathens were addicted. Some of them had been Gentiles, and the rest had acted according to the manners of the nations, rather than as it became “the peculiar people of God:” for they had habitually allowed themselves in various lascivious imaginations, dalliances, or secret practices, or in more gross lewdness; or they had been guilty of drunkenness and excess; and they had frequented those riotous, luxurious, and dissipated “revellings and banquetings,” where intemperance was practised; and many of them had joined in those idolatries which were most detestable both in themselves, and by the shameful and enormous licentiousness connected with them. (Note, Eph. 4:17—19.)—The Jews, at that time, were exceedingly exact and scrupulous, in avoiding all approaches to gross idolatry: it is not therefore at all probable, that the apostle meant this of converts from among them; which confirms the opinion, that the epistle was not written exclusively to the Jewish converts.—Some had lived in one, some in another, and several of them in many of these enormities: thus a great part of their lives had been spent to bad purpose; and this reflection ought to render them the more diligent in serving God, for the residue of their days. But their unconverted neighbors, especially the Gentiles, finding them separated from their old pursuits, and set against them; and that they would no longer join with them in their revels, and “profusion of riot,” were estranged from them, and looked on them as a precise intractable set of people. The conduct of Christians was a silent reproof of their excesses; and so they “spake evil of them,” or “blasphemed” their religion; and charged them with various crimes of which they were not guilty. But whilst they thus unjustly judged and condemned Christians, they must speedily render an account of themselves to him, who was “ready to judge both the living and the dead;” being even then possessed of all power and authority for that purpose. (Marg. Ref. r.) The apostle uses the first person, thus joining himself with his Christian brethren; probably, as a less offensive manner of stating the subject; and as conscious, that, though free from many of the gross crimes here mentioned, he had yet spent too many years of his past life, “according to the course of the world,” and “to the lusts of men, and not according to the will of God.” (Notes, Eph. 2:1—3. Tit. 3:4—7.)—Some learned men indeed venture to change the text, without any authority, and to read “may suffice you:” but the same principle might lead us to explain the words, as addressed exclusively to the Gentile converts: because the Jews had never lived in “abominable idolatries.”

6 For, for this cause was the gospel preached also <sup>s</sup> to them that are dead, <sup>t</sup> that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, <sup>u</sup> but live according to God in the Spirit.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The gospel had before this been preached to those, who were “dead” when the apostle wrote, (either as martyrs for the truth, or dying in the course of providence,) for this very reason, viz. “that they might be judged according to men in the flesh;” and, by the proud and carnal judgment of wicked men, be condemned as evil-doers, and some even suffer death at their hands; but that at the same time, being “quicken’d” to a divine life by the Holy Spirit, they might “live to God” as his devoted servants, and his witnesses among their persecutors; and so be prepared for living with him for ever in heaven. (Note, Rom. 8:10,11.) Thus their transient afflictions, disgrace, and sufferings, soon terminated in perfect felicity. In the mean time, they glorified God in life and death, and were supported and comforted by him: and the gospel had been the means of preparing them for these things, as it still continued to prepare others to glorify God, to “serve their generation,” and then, after some fleeting sorrows, to be admitted to everlasting, uninterrupted joy, and unalloyed felicity. (Notes, 3:19,20. 1 Cor. 15:29,30.) This seems the meaning of the verse, which is generally allowed to be obscure. Some explain it of those who were “dead in sin,” to whom the gospel was preached; that being quickened and converted, their old nature might be judged, condemned, and crucified, that so they might “no longer live to the lusts of men in the flesh,” but to the glory of God by the Spirit.—Several other interpretations are given; but that above stated seems the most satisfactory; and it best connects the verse with the words which immediately precede. “The dead,” there means such as had already died, “the quick,” or living, those who were then alive on earth: both of these Christ will judge. The gospel was preached, in order to the salvation of the hearers; they who embraced it were condemned according to men, or by man’s judgment, but they were accepted by God. The same had been the case with those, to whom the gospel had formerly been preached, who were since dead, even those from the beginning who had been favored with the word of God. Believers had been persecuted and condemned by men; but “they lived according to God in the Spirit,” or “by the Spirit;” while their persecutors, if impenitent, would be judged and condemned by the Lord.

7 But <sup>x</sup> the end of all things is at hand; <sup>y</sup> be ye therefore sober, <sup>z</sup> and watch unto prayer.

Note.—Christians must expect tribulations in the world, but these would soon terminate; for the "end of all things was at hand," and death was about to close their course of trials or services; nay, judgment would not be so long delayed, as that the intervening space should, in the estimation of faith, be at all compared with eternity. (Marg. Ref. x.—Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. 1 Cor. 7:29—31.) It was therefore incumbent on them to be sober, considerate, temperate in all kinds of animal indulgence, and moderate in all their worldly pursuits. They ought also to be "vigilant," and to guard against the various assaults of their spiritual foes; and especially to be "watchful," that nothing might unfit them for prayer, or lead them to neglect it; or to grow remiss in that duty and means of grace, on which the safety and prosperity of their souls so greatly depended. (Notes, 5:8,9. Matt. 26:40,41. Luke 21:34—36. Eph. 6:18—20. Jam. 5:16—18.)—Many expositors explain "the end of all things," to signify the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and the whole constitution of the Jewish nation in church and state. But the Christians in Asia Minor were far distant from Jerusalem, and not immediately concerned in those events; as they and all others were and are in the speedy approach of death and judgment, to which the words most naturally lead our minds, and which alone answer to the full import of them. (Notes, Matt. 24:29—51.)

Note.—(Notes, 1:22. 1 Cor. 13:4—7. Jam. 5:19,20.) The apostle here again enforced the exhortation to charity, or love of each other; and in doing this he referred to the proverb, that "love covereth all sins," or "the multitude of sins." (Note, Prov. 10:12.) As the love of God in Christ "covereth the multitude of the sins" of believers, from his sight; (Note, Ps. 32:1,2.) so they ought to cast the mantle of love over the number of faults, into which their brethren would fall, in their conduct towards them; and thus hide them from their eyes, by forbearing and forgiving one another, as Christ had forgiven them. (Eph. 4:30—32. 5:1,2. Col. 3:13,14.) Thus the peace of the church, and the communion of the saints, might be preserved, which otherwise must be interrupted: for there were so many things amiss in all, that unless love covered, excused, and forgave, in others, such mistakes and faults, as every one would have need to be borne with in himself, Satan would prevail to excite perpetual divisions and discords among them.—To suppose, that charity, or love, will so cover, or make amends for, the multitude of the man's sins who exercises it, as to induce God to forgive them, is totally subversive of the whole gospel; for "if righteousness come by the law, then Christ died in vain:" and the perversion of these words, which are very obvious and important in their true meaning, has encouraged such numbers to neglect Christ, and continue impenitent in their sins, from a vain hope of being pardoned for the sake of a proud partial benevolence, and some selfish alms-deeds, which by no means constitute the love of which the apostle spoke, (Note, 1 Cor. 13:4—7.) that a particular and repeated protest against it seems absolutely necessary.—"He commends 'mutual love, because it, as it were, buries innumerable trespasses; and so is a favorer and preserver of peace. For those who love one another, easily forgive each other's offences.' Beza.—Self-love veils and covers our own faults; and its effect, in rendering men blind to their own characters, however quick-sighted in other things, is notorious, and allowed on all sides: now if we truly loved others, as we do ourselves; love would veil and cover their faults also, and render us less keen in noticing and animadverting on them; and more disposed to forbearance and long-suffering towards them.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—(Notes, Rom. 12:6—13. 1 Tim. 3:2. Heb. 13:1—3. 3 John 5—8.) In general, Christians were exhorted to show their love, by hospitality to strangers, without grudging, or inwardly repining at the expense to which it might put them: and, more particularly, whatever gift any man had received of the Lord's free bounty, whether natural abilities, learning, influence, wealth, authority, or spiritual endowments, he was required to employ and improve it for the advantage of his brethren; that so they might all reciprocally be useful to one another, and derive benefit from each other, both in their temporal and spiritual concerns. they would act, as good, faithful, wise, and active "stewards" of those manifold talents, which God, of his abundant mercy and "grace," had intrusted to them, for their own and each other's advantage. Luke 12:35—46. 16:1—13. 1 Cor. 4:1—5. 2 Cor. 6:1,2.*) This especially, though by no means exclusively, concerned ministers, and those employed in managing the affairs of the church. If any one therefore spoke, either as a public teacher, or in private conversation; let him discourse in consistency with "the oracles of God," which infallibly declare his truth and will to mankind: and if any man acted as a deacon, or in any other way ministered to the support and comfort of believers, or of the poor; let him do it to the best of his ability, as given to him of God for that purpose: and let him communicate to the relief of others, not as if he gave them any thing which was properly his own, but as imparting a portion of what God had, for this end, committed to his stewardship. (Note, 1 Chr. 29:10—19.) That so "God might be glorified," by their conscientious, cheerful, and becoming performance of their several duties, and improvement of their talents, from faith, and in a disposition to give the glory to him of all which they had and did; and to ascribe to him, through Jesus Christ, all the honor of his perfections and wonderful works for evermore.—To restrict this merely to spiritual gifts, because the original word is used, when these are spoken of, (though not used of them exclusively,) may be considered as one of the various ways, by which learned commentators endeavor to convince us, that a vast proportion of the scripture was written, not for our instruction, but for that of others, long since dead; and that we need concern ourselves but little about it. Now this is precisely what a vast majority of professed Christians wish to believe.—Good stewards. (10) Notes, Gen. 24:2—9. 39:2—6. Heb. 3:1—6.

his glory shall be revealed, <sup>a</sup> ye may be glad also with exceeding joy.

14 If <sup>b</sup> ye be <sup>c</sup> reproached for the name of Christ, <sup>d</sup> happy are ye; <sup>e</sup> for the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you: <sup>f</sup> on their part he is evil spoken of, <sup>g</sup> but on your part he is glorified.

15 But let none of you <sup>h</sup> suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil-doer, <sup>i</sup> or as a busy body in other men's matters.

16 Yet if any man suffer <sup>k</sup> as a Christian, <sup>l</sup> let him not be ashamed; <sup>m</sup> but let him glorify God on this behalf.

Note.—The apostle again exhorted his brethren to patience, fortitude, and cheerfulness, under their sufferings for the sake of Christ. He had before spoken of these, as intended to prove their faith and purify their souls, even as the furnace tries and refines the gold. (Note, 1:6, 7.) They ought not, therefore, to be surprised, or become desponding or alarmed, by "the fiery trial which" God had appointed to "try them," and which they must needs pass through; as if some strange thing had happened to them, which was not experienced by others of the Lord's people. (Notes, 3—5. 5:8,9.) On the contrary, they ought to "rejoice," at being conformed to Christ, by suffering from the same description of men, and for the same cause, in which he suffered: their trials should be considered as pledges of love, and introductory to the participation of his glory; in order that when that "shall be revealed" at his coming, they may be admitted to partake of it "with exceeding joy." (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 8:14—23. 2 Cor. 4:8—18. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 2 Tim. 2:8—13.)—If they were "reproached," because they bare the name, professed the truth, and obeyed the commands of Christ; they were "happy" and favored persons. (Notes, 3:13—16. Is. 51:7,8. 66:5,6. Matt. 5:10—12. 10:24—26. Luke 6:21—26.) This evinced, that the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of glory, who is glorious in his eternal Deity, and the Author of all that is truly glorious or excellent in men, namely the divine image, the beginning of heavenly glory, "even the Spirit of God," rested upon them. (Notes, Num. 11:25,26,28,29. 2 Kings 2:16—18. Is. 11:2—5. 59:20,21.) Thus the glory of God was seen in their conduct and dispositions; and this excited the enmity of the "carnally-minded:" so that, on the part of their revilers and persecutors, the Holy Spirit and his operations, as well as Christ and the Father who sent him, were evil-spoken of and blasphemed; but "on their part God was glorified," as they patiently suffered, for his sake, the effects of that enmity, which their loyal profession and conduct had excited. The case, however, would be evidently different, if they exposed themselves to sufferings by their crimes; for this would be most dishonorable to God, and injurious to themselves. It behoved them, therefore, to be careful, that none of them were brought before the magistrates, cast into prison, or condemned, for committing murder, or theft, or any other violation of wholesome laws; nay, that they did not incur reproach by intermeddling in the affairs of other men, whether they were of a private or a public nature, especially on political subjects; or by passing their judgment and censures, or intruding into the management of those concerns, which did not belong to them: as if they had been appointed, or were authorized and qualified, to oversee and give orders to those employ'd. These were common reasons for men's suffering public punishment or private reproach; and professors of Christianity might be drawn into such misconduct, and yet vainly imagine that they were persecuted for their religion! But if they avoided such imputations, and suffered as Christians for acting consistently with that honorable character; they ought by no means to be ashamed of the reproach, connected with their punishment; though it were imprisonment, scourging, or even a violent and ignominious death: nay, they ought rather to praise and glorify God for "counting them worthy to suffer shame for his sake." 17 For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?

18 And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?

19 Wherefore, let them that suffer according to the will of God, commit the keeping of their souls to him in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator.

Note.—It was indeed to be expected, that Christians would be thus called to suffer for Christ's sake: for the time predicted by him, when he would begin his judgments, by first sharply trying his professed disciples, or the family of God, was then arriv'd; and if "fiery trials" must prove and purify the church, and purge out hypocrites from among them, before judgments were executed on the Jewish nation, and other open enemies; "what would be the end of those who did not obey the gospel?"

The persecutions, by which the church was tried, were introductory to the destruction of Jerusalem and the tremendous ruin of the Jews; and preparatory to "the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." (Notes, Ez. 9:5—7. Matt. 24:9—14. John 16:1—3. 2 Pet. 3:5—7.) If then the righteous were saved with difficulty; if, notwithstanding their relation to Christ, and union with him, and their conscientious self-denying obedience, so many trials, dangers, conflicts, and sufferings were deemed needful for them; and if, according to their own feelings and apprehensions, they were often but just saved, and got to heaven at last, through many narrow escapes, as a shipwrecked mariner scarcely gains the shore on a plank: (Notes, Acts 27:29—32,42—44.) where would ungodly men, of every kind, where would the sinner, the profligate and vicious, the impenitent, the despiser, or opposer of Christianity, appear at the day of Judgment? (Note, Rom. 5:6—10.) What refuge from the wrath of God could he expect to find? Or how could he hope to escape the everlasting punishment, with which he was threatened in the holy scriptures? As therefore the trials of Christians were trivial, compared either with "the perdition of ungodly men," or the felicity prepared for the righteous; (Note, 2 Cor. 4:13—18.) they ought, when suffering in the cause and according to the will of God, to commit the keeping of their souls, (as well as the protection of their lives, and all their other concerns,) to his almighty care; who, being their Creator, had a property in them as his rational creatures, and who regarded them as his redeemed servants, new-created unto holiness, and interested in all the blessings of his covenant, and in his faithfulness to perform it to them. Taking care, therefore, to persevere "in well-doing," and to suffer with meekness, patience, and constancy, without turning aside, either through fear, resentment, or worldly motives; let them trust themselves to his faithful care, who, being the Creator of the world, could not want power to support, comfort, deliver, and eternally save them; and who, as now become their Saviour, would certainly over-rule every thing to their final advantage.—"The apostle cannot intend deliverance from 'the Roman invasion, in which so few of these Christians were concerned: nor merely deliverance from any of their persecutors; because 'he takes it for granted, that "the righteous would be saved," though with difficulty; whereas multitudes fell by persecution, even 'of these Christians in Bithynia, as appears by 'Pliny's letter. It is necessary therefore to understand it, more generally, of the difficulty with 'which good men get to heaven, through this 'dangerous and ensnaring world.' Doddridge.

self with the same mind," which was in Christ, the Captain of our salvation; that love, zeal, spirituality, hatred of sin, contempt of the world, fortitude, patience, meekness, and hope, may concur in determining him to venture and suffer all things, for the glory of God, the good of men, and "the joy set before him." (Notes, Phil. 2:5—11. P. O. 1—11. Note, Heb. 12: 1—3.) Thus, being "crucified with Christ," by the virtue of his "sufferings for us in the flesh;" and deeming himself "dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God;" he will be enabled to resist temptation, to "cease from sin, and no longer to live the rest of his time in the flesh, to the lusts of men, but to the will of God." Indeed we may all say, (though some far more emphatically than others,) that "the time past of our lives should suffice us to have wrought the will" of those "who know not God;" and we cannot but regret, if brought to our right mind, that so large a proportion of our precious time has been wasted to no purpose, or employed to bad purpose; whether we have escaped the grosser "pollutions of the world," or have walked in its lasciviousness, lusts, excess, and riot; or in those "revellings and banquetings," where God is no more regarded, and often more outraged, than amidst the "abominable idolatries" of the Gentiles. Very few of us indeed have avoided the indulgent and dissipated feasts, and banquetings, which professed Christians both in the higher and lower classes of society generally make, and that often under pretence of commemorating some of the events relating to redemption: (Note, Ez. 32:1. P. O. 1—14.) but, when we separate from them, and refuse to "run with them to the same excess of riot," they "think it strange," and revile us; because by our conduct we condemn them. (Note, John 7:8—10.) This we must not regard; but, having shown our reasons as far as we have opportunity, we must leave them "to him who is ready to judge the quick and the dead;" to whom, if they continue impenitent, they will have a dreadful account to give at the last day.—Vast numbers, who are now dead, have suffered the same revilings before us: the gospel called them to separate from the wickedness of their former companions in sin, and to bear testimony against it; they were therefore "judged according to men in the flesh," as deserving reproach and persecution; but "they lived according to God in the Spirit;" and when they were removed out of the world, they were found "meet to be partakers of the heavenly inheritance." Ours is indeed a favored day in this respect: yet if "the Spirit of life" dwell in us, the world will judge us deserving of scorn and reproach, whilst God will graciously account us "worthy of that glorious kingdom for which we suffer."

"The end of all things is at hand." All our worldly pursuits, possessions, distinctions, and enjoyments; all our temporal trials, sorrows, and conflicts; our season of probation and preparation; and our term of usefulness will speedily, very speedily be over: it behoves us then "to be sober, and to watch unto prayer." (Notes, Eph. 6:18—20. Col. 4:2—4.)—The more ungodly men hate and revile believers, the greater care should they use to have "fervent love among themselves;" that, by mutual candor, long-suffering, and forgiveness, "the multitude of offences may be covered;" and so nothing may interrupt their peace and harmony. This blessed grace of love dethrones our natural selfishness, and, in connexion with faith in the promises of God, it induces us to "use hospitality one to another without grudging;" and to consider every gift, possession, or situation, as a talent committed to our stewardship, according to "the manifold grace of God," to be used for the benefit of the church, and the community. It also dictates or regulates our words, whether in public or in private, that they may be true, pure, kind, and instructive, "according to the oracles of God;" and it disposes every one, in his proper calling, to minister or communicate to others, "as of the ability which God giveth, that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ;" to whom "be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen."

V. 12—19.

When we consider the upright, harmless, benevolent, and useful conduct of true Christians, we are apt to "think it strange," that they must pass through "fiery trials," from the enmity of wicked men, and that God should permit them to be injured and afflicted. We must not, however, indulge such thoughts, but prepare for tribulation; as "the excellent of the earth" have always been thus treated, and God has purified all his gold in this furnace. We ought therefore to "rejoice in being made partakers of the sufferings of Christ, that when his glory shall be revealed, we may be glad also with exceeding" and eternal "joy." We may indeed deem ourselves "happy," when wicked men discern "the seal of God in our forehead;" and "reproach us for the name of Christ;" because "the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon us;" and they revile us, because we bear his image, belong to him, and glorify him.—But we cannot be too careful, not to give the enemies of the gospel any just cause to revile or hate us. It is not indeed common for professors of evangelical truths, to suffer as murderers, thieves, or malefactors; yet they often bring odium upon themselves by a conceited officiousness, and by intermeddling with such concerns as do not at all belong to them, especially in political matters; as well as by various other evident and palpable faults: and then many of them unjustly impute the reproach cast on them, to the persecuting malice of their enemies! This we should watch against; and carefully distinguish between those things, which we suffer "for the sake of Christ and of righteousness," and those that we bring on ourselves by imprudence and misconduct. In the former case if we bear our trials with meekness and constancy, "we suffer as Christians, and should glorify God in that behalf;" in the latter we should be silent, or humbly confess our sin and folly as the cause of our sorrows.—In vain do men expect to escape the trial of their professed faith: "judgment will begin at the house of God;" his people will be more severely chastised for their sins than other men are; and hypocrites will incur the deepest condemnation. (Notes, Am. 3:1—3. Zech. 13: 8, 9. Mal. 3:1—4. Matt. 3:7—12.) They who would be saved must strive, wrestle, labor, watch, pray, deny themselves, and "take up their cross daily:" and though all true believers will "surely be saved," it will be with difficulty, and through many perils, conflicts, and tribulations. (P. O. Acts 27:21—44.) "What then will be the end of those, who obey not the gospel of God?" and where will the infidel, the profligate, the licentious, the oppressor, the persecutor, and the enemy of all goodness appear, when Christ shall come to judge the world? If such sufferings are inflicted on the beloved children of God, what will be the doom of his implacable foes? And if such diligence and watchfulness only just suffice to ensure the believer's salvation; what will be the event of the slothful and heedless conduct of professed Christians in general? (Notes and P. O. Luke 13:22—30. Notes, 1 Cor. 9:24—P. O. 19—27. Notes and P. O. 2 Pet. 1:5—11.) Let us then see to it, that we "obey the gospel," by a penitent "faith working by love;" and, if called to "suffer, according to the will of God;" "let us commit the keeping of our souls to him, in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator," and as in Christ become our Omnipotent Saviour. (Note, Is. 12:2.)

CHAP. V.

The apostle exhorts "the elders to feed the flock of God," willingly, cheerfully, disinterestedly, and humbly; and to be examples to it; expecting from the chief Shepherd, at his appearance, an unfolding crown of glory. 1—4. He requires the younger to submit to the elder; and all of them to be "clothed with humility," "ceasing all their care on" God, "—7; and to be "sober and vigilant;" and steadfastly, by faith, to "resist the devil," and bear "trial, &c." He concludes with prayers, salutations, and benedictions, 10—14.

Note.—"The elders" were, in general, the rulers and teachers of the churches; (Notes, Acts 11:27—30. 14:21—23. 20:17. 1 Tim. 3:1.) and St. Peter, waving the mention of his apostolical office, addressed them as being himself one of the company, and as acquainted with the nature and difficulties of the service assigned to them. He had also been a spectator of the sufferings of Christ, in the garden, and probably on the cross; and was especially appointed to bear witness of those interesting events, and of his Lord's resurrection, ascension, and subsequent exaltation. (Note, Heb.

12:1.) Moreover, he was fully assured, that, as a pardoned and justified believer, and as sealed by the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit, he was called to inherit, and would at length partake of, "the glory which shall be revealed," and publicly bestowed on all true Christians, when the Lord Jesus shall come to judge the world. (Note, John 13:36—38.) As therefore he was employed in preaching the gospel of salvation, through the sufferings of the Redeemer, whose steps he endeavored to follow, in patiently bearing afflictions for the truth's sake; and as he was supported by the joyful expectation of future felicity to disregard present things, even in constant expectation of ending his life by crucifixion, whilst from love to Christ he fed his sheep and lambs; (Notes, John 21:15—23.) he exhorted all those, who were appointed to the same work, to apply themselves diligently to the performance of it, with the self-denying tenderness and patient care, with which the shepherd feeds and tends his flock. (Notes, Luke 12:22—34. Acts 20:28.) They ought to consider the congregations, over which they severally presided, and among whom they labored, as a part of the "purchased" and beloved "flock of God;" and so "take the oversight of them," not merely because "necessity was laid upon them," and they could not safely do otherwise; but "willingly," from zeal to the glory of God and love to the souls of his people; and as men who were ready to encounter difficulties, face dangers, and endure losses, reproaches, and persecutions in so good a work. (Note, 1 Cor. 9:13—18.) And when the counsel of inspired persons, or other pious ministers, concurring with the wants and desires of the people, called on any one to engage in the pastoral office, he ought not to feel reluctant to it, as some were found to be; partly from modesty and diffidence, yet not without a measure of unbelief, and undue regard to the ease, quiet, and safety of a private situation, the want of zeal and love, or the preference of more profitable employments: whence it became necessary, almost to constrain them to engage in this arduous, laborious, and perilous work. This is generally supposed to be implied; yet the charge is made to those who were already elders. At the same time, some improper persons of inferior stations might be induced to undertake the office of the ministry, from the expectation and desire of a better maintenance, than they could otherwise obtain; (Note, Jam. 3:1,2.) and such as had been ordained, might be tempted to go through with their services, rather to secure their incomes, than from better motives, and to modify their instructions in subserviency to their own interests: but such things must scrupulously be avoided; as the lucre thus sought would be most filthy and base, and the wages of the vilest prostitution. all true ministers should enter into that office, and perform its duties, "of a ready mind," delighting in the work, and desirous of glorifying God, and of being his instruments in doing good to the souls of men; considering their own temporal interests as a matter of a very inferior nature; and even their maintenance, merely as necessary in order to the due performance of their office, and not an object to be proposed by them, in undertaking or conducting it. Nor ought they to assume a "lordly authority," or aspire at secular power and honor, by means of their ministry; as if they had "dominion over the faith" or consciences of those, who belonged to God, as "the lot of his inheritance;" when they were appointed to show them his truth and will, (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:23, 24. 4:7.) and to engage their obedience to him, not to themselves. (Notes, Matt. 20:24—28. Luke 22:24—27.) Instead, therefore, of usurping authority over their brethren, or endeavoring to convert their office into a lucrative trade; they ought to behave in such a manner, as to be "examples to the flock," and to elucidate by their own piety, purity, humility, self-denial, and universal conscientiousness, the instructions which they gave to the people. (Notes, 1 Tim. 4:11—16. Tit. 2:7, 8.) This would not indeed tend to their worldly affluence or dignity; but it would ensure to them a most abundant future recompense. For "when the Chief Shepherd," (Notes, Ps. 23:1—3. Ez. 34:23—31. Zech. 13:7. John 10:10—18. Heb. 13:20, 21.) from whom their pastoral charge was derived, on whom they depended for all their sufficiency, to whom the flock belonged, and to whom they must finally give account, "shall appear" as "the Judge of the world;" then they, and all such faithful ministers, will receive a crown of unfading glory, infinitely better and more honorable than all the authority, reputation, wealth, and pleasure of the world, could possibly be. (Notes, Matt. 25:19—23, 31—34. 1 Cor. 4:2—5. 1 Thes. 2:17—20. 1 Tim. 6:11—16. 2 Tim. 4:1—8.)

This must be allowed a decisive testimony, that no express distinction between presbyters and bishops was at the time, when the apostle wrote, established in the church. It would however be well, if desisting from such controversies about precedency, all, whether called bishops, or archbishops, presbyters, or elders, of every church, would more studly, and endeavor to practise the admirable lessons here inculcated.—Alas, how small a proportion of nominal ministers of Christianity, either in the more exalted orders, or among their often too much depressed inferiors, so preach, labor, and live, as to give an impartial student of the Bible reason to conclude, that "when the chief Shepherd shall appear, they will receive the crown of unfading glory."—By constraint. ] Αναγκαστως. 5 Likewise <sup>r</sup> ye younger submit yourselves unto the elder. Yea, <sup>s</sup> all of you be subject one to another, and <sup>t</sup> be clothed with humility: for <sup>u</sup> God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.

7 <sup>b</sup> Casting all your care upon him; <sup>c</sup> for he careth for you.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The word "younger" (νεωτεροι, Luke 22:26.) does not seem here to relate to any particular station in the church; but in general denotes juniors, whether in the pastoral office or not, who were exhorted to "submit themselves," and show deference to their seniors, as well as to "the elders of the church." (Notes, 1 Tim. 5:1, 2. Tit. 2:3—6.) Yea, all Christians were directed to be "subject to one another," according to their different relations in life: thus the people should obey their pastors, children their parents, subjects their rulers, and servants their masters, according to the precepts of God's word. (Lev. 19:32.—Notes, Ex. 20:12. Eph. 5:21.) And as pride, in juniors and inferiors, militates against due subordination, even as in superiors it prompts to tyranny; so they all were admonished to be clothed with humility, as their chief ornament, or rather their outward garment: that whatever abilities, endowments, or spiritual gifts they possessed, their modesty and humility might be conspicuous to all beholders, more than any other distinction. This ought above all things to be sought for; seeing that God contended by his omnipotence against all proud persons, showing favor to none, but those who were deeply sensible of their unworthiness; and conferring this special grace on all who were thus humbly desirous of it. (Notes, Jam. 4:4—10.)—It therefore behoved all men to "humble themselves," as guilty, polluted, and wretched sinners, under the "powerful hand of God," which was sufficient to crush his stoutest enemy, and to uphold his feeblest friend: that so, submitting to his righteousness, they might be reconciled to him by faith in Christ, and in due time exalted to the glory, honor, and immor-

9 Whom <sup>k</sup> resist <sup>l</sup> steadfast in the faith, knowing that <sup>m</sup> the same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren that are in the world.

Note.—The apostle here again renewed his exhortation to sobriety and vigilance; (Notes, 1:13—16. 4:7.) that, being free from the intoxication of sensual and dissipated pleasures, or worldly interests, the Christians whom he addressed, might not be lulled asleep, or found off their guard in the great concerns of eternity. (Note, Luke 21:34—36.) To excite them to this watchfulness, they must be reminded, that “the devil,” the “prince of the darkness of this world,” and of the apostate angels, “the accuser of the brethren,” and “the adversary” of believers, who always seized on every opportunity of bringing some charge against them, or of obtaining leave to sift and harass them, was “walking about, like a roaring lion,” full of rage and fierceness, seeking whom he could find asleep or unarmed, that he might at once devour him, or swallow him up. (Notes, Job 1:6—12. Zech. 3:1—4. Luke 22:31—34. Rev. 12:7—12.) The terrible persecutions which were instigated by this enemy of God and man, as “working in the children of disobedience,” seem to be peculiarly intended. Thus outward terrors, and inward suggestions, drove numbers into apostacy, or a temporary denial of Christ; many were finally ruined, from fear of man, and love of life; and others narrowly escaped this downfall, being found careless and secure. All Christians then ought to resist and repel his assaults; being “steadfast” in the profession of the faith, assuredly believing the truths of the gospel, and constantly depending on the power and love of Christ, to repel and drive away the hated tempter. And to excite them thus strenuously to resist temptation, and “strive against sin,” though it were even unto imprisonment, cruel mockings, stripes, or death; they should be fully informed, and know assuredly, that “their brethren,” dispersed in other parts of the world, constantly endured afflictions of the same kind, in the same cause, and from the same sort of persons.—These repeated exhortations to “watchfulness,” and the especial motive assigned for it, ought to have peculiar weight; as coming from that apostle, who, through self-confidence, carnal security, and unwatchfulness, when “Satan desired to sift him” and his brethren “as wheat,” was induced to deny his Lord with solemn oaths and dire imprecations. 11 To <sup>u</sup> him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen.

Note.—The apostle did not pray, that his brethren might be exempted from salutary and honorable trials: but he besought “the God of all grace,” (Marg. Ref. n.) being plenteous in mercy, and the inexhaustible and only Source of every kind and measure of grace; who, by his word and Spirit, had “called them to the hope” and sure earnest of “eternal glory,” through Jesus Christ; (Note, 1 Thes. 2:9—12.) that, “after they had suffered awhile,” for the trial and increase<sup>o</sup> of their faith, he would make them mature and complete in holiness; establish them in the peace and hope of the gospel, strengthen them to resist all kinds of temptations, to endure all sufferings, and to perform all duties, by invigorating their holy affections; (*Notes, 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Phil. 4:10—13. Note.—It is highly probable, that Silvanus was the same person, who generally attended St. Paul, and who was frequently called Silas. (Marg. Ref. x.—Notes, Acts 15:22—41.) St. Peter “supposed” and concluded, from all he saw and heard, that he was “a faithful brother,” a true believer, and a zealous minister of Christ, “unto them,” among whom he had so frequently and permanently labored. He had therefore taken the opportunity of writing by him a brief epistle, exhorting them to be steadfast, and to act consistently with their Christian profession. He also testified to the gospel which they had received; to satisfy them, that the doctrines of grace which they had embraced, and in the faith and experience of which they stood accepted with God, were indeed the truths of Christ; and that the power of them upon their hearts, and the fruits of them in their lives, evinced them to be partakers of the grace of God, and fully established in his favor.—This confirms the supposition, that St. Peter wrote, to establish in the faith the same churches, which had been planted by St. Paul and his companions; against all the insinuations of those, who endeavored to persuade the Gentile converts, that he preached a different doctrine than the other apostles did: and indeed the attentive reader will remark a great similarity in the sentiments of those two great apostles; especially in the manner in which they connect doctrine and practice together.

Note.—There is no sufficient ground to suppose, that by Babylon, the apostle mystically meant Rome; for no reason can be assigned, why he should withhold the name of that city, when he wrote this epistle. Yet if any choose to avail themselves of this only scriptural proof, that Peter ever resided at this great antichristian metropolis; Protestants are not concerned to controvert it. It is, however, generally allowed, that Peter went to Rome, and there suffered martyrdom.—It is not certain, whether Marcus is, or is not, the same with John Mark, mentioned frequently by St. Paul, and in the Acts of the apostles. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

Those who most know the nature, difficulties, snares, and temptations of the pastoral office, are best qualified to exhort their brethren; and they will speak with the most impressive authority on such topics. (Note, Matt. 7:28,29.) So to contemplate the sufferings of Christ, as to understand the design of them, and experience their effects, in humbling and sanctifying the heart, gives the best grounded confidence of being “partakers of the glory which shall be revealed;” and they, who would counsel to the greatest effect, must not needlessly or habitually use the language of superiority or command.—Ministers should unite skill, vigilance, diligence, faithfulness, love, zeal, patience, disinterestedness, and self-abasement, in their characters and conduct; both in order “to feed the flock of God;” and to be “examples unto them.” They ought to perform the most laborious services, and endure the greatest hardships, for “the Lord’s heritage,” “not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind;” and without assuming any “dominion over their faith.”—This is not, indeed, the road to high preferments in the outward church, nay, it leads far from it: but “when the chief Shepherd shall appear,” such pastors “shall receive” of him “a crown of glory that will never fade away.” And what, compared with this, are all those riches, eminent stations, or lordly dignities, which so many nominal pastors eagerly pursue? Or where will the avaricious, the slothful, the sensual, or the tyrannical men, who have borne the name of ministers, appear, when the great Judge shall come, and call them to give an account of their stewardship? (Notes, and P. O. Is. 56:9—12. Ez. 31:1—9. Note, Zech. 11:15—17.) The sentence to be then denounced against them, and executed on them, is already recorded: may they read it, and tremble, and “flee from the wrath to come!” (Note, Matt. 24:45—51.)—But every station and age has its peculiar duties: subordination is the universal plan and appointment of God; the younger should submit themselves unto the elder; and all, in their several relations, should be subject to those placed over them. This will be the case, as far as men “are clothed with humility;” and God never shows favor to a proud man, except when he brings him down into the dust of self-abasement: (Note, Dan. 4:34—37.) nor will any humble soul come short of his grace, or of eternal life. Let us then “humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God,” for he is able to save and to destroy: then “he will exalt us in due time,” as much as is good for us, in his church on earth, and among “his saints in glory everlasting.”—When we become humbly subject to our reconciled God, and simply dependent on him; we are allowed and commanded to “cast all our care on him;” and assured “that he careth for us," as a Father for his own children: and this will bring far sweeter peace and greater comfort into the soul, than could arise from the most complete gratification of pride, ambition, avarice, or any worldly affections. Thus also we shall be safe: for humility will induce us to be "sober and vigilant," diligently attending to our duty: simply depending on the Lord in all things, and patiently submitting to his whole will concerning us. This is our part, and thus we may unreservedly and cheerfully leave all events to the God to whom alone they belong.

V. 8—14.

When we consider the indefatigable malice, power, and subtlety of "our adversary the devil, who goeth about seeking whom he may devour," and recollect what numbers he continually destroys; we cannot but perceive our indispensable need of vigilance, and confidence in God, and constant fervent prayer, for protection and deliverance. Did a roaring lion at any time traverse our streets, devouring numbers of the careless and inattentive; and we were informed of it, by indisputable testimony; we should proceed with great caution and circumspection, if obliged to go out in such perilous circumstances: yet a far more formidable enemy continually watches his opportunity of destroying our souls; God himself gives us the information and alarm; and we cannot have any safety except we "watch and are sober." But, alas! how little do we take the warning, and act as if we really believed this to be the case! Yet in this way alone can we reasonably hope to be kept from falling into temptation, and being overcome by it. (Notes, Matt. 6:13. 26:40,41. Luke 22:31—34,39—46.)—If, however, we must encounter this dreadful foe, we should "resist him steadfast in the faith," and then the Lord will constrain him to "flee from us." In whatever form he assaults us, or by whatever agents, we may know assuredly, that our brethren in all parts of the world experience similar conflicts, temptations, and tribulations. We should therefore, when rescued from urgent danger, nay, while resisting, steadfast in the faith, pray for them also, that after they have suffered awhile, the "God of all grace would perfect, stablish, strengthen, and settle them." This he will do for all, whom he has "called to his eternal glory by Jesus Christ;" that they may celebrate his praises, as his willing subjects for ever and ever.—All the apostles and evangelists exhort us to these things, and "testify that this is the true grace of God:" may we then steadfastly adhere to this primitive Christianity, and not listen to "cunningly devised fables!" Thus it will appear that we were elected together with those, who are now in glory; that we are indeed faithful brethren with all the family of God; that we desire to live in love with them; and to share that peace, which belongs to all that are "in Christ Jesus," and to them exclusively.

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER.

THE writer of this epistle calls himself "Simon Peter," (1:1. Acts 15:14. Gr.) "an apostle of Jesus Christ;" he alludes to circumstances and facts, which agree to none but Peter; (1:14—16. John 21:19.) he calls it his "second epistle;" (3:1.) and he speaks of his "beloved brother, Paul." (3:15.) It must, therefore, either be the work of the apostle Peter, or of one who personated him: but 'it is a thing of the worst example, for any man to forge another's name, or pretend to be the person he is not.' Le Clerc. It may be added, 'especially to forge the name of an apostle, and to personate him, in order to sanction a man's private opinions by so high an authority.' Yet the epistle is remarkable for the energy, with which the writer inculcates holiness; and the solemn, yet affectionate manner, in which he testifies against the delusions of those who neglect it. It has indeed been urged, that the style remarkably differs from that of St. Peter's first epistle: but this is by no means true, except in respect to a part of the second chapter, which in fact seems to have been taken, in a measure at least, from some writing, which described in very strong language, the false prophets of that age, or of earlier ages; which was then extant, and well known, but is now lost. St. Jude seems also to have taken some things from it; for part of his epistle greatly coincides with the second chapter of this. In all other respects, the internal characters of authenticity are very strong.—Some doubts, however, in this respect were entertained in the primitive church; which Jerome ascribes to the supposed dissimilarity of style. But, it is probable, that it was written only a short time before the apostle's martyrdom; and, not having been so publicly avowed by him, and clearly known to be his, during his life-time, the scrupulous caution of the church hesitated about admitting it into the sacred canon; till internal evidence fully convinced the most competent judges, that it was entitled to that high distinction. It is generally supposed to have been written at least three or four years after the former epistle; and it is evident, that primarily it was intended for the same persons, though not expressly addressed to them.—It appears, that the apostle, by this epistle, especially designed to put Christians upon their guard, against the false apostles and teachers, who perverted the gospel; and the profane scoffers, who started objections to the truth of it: but it is replete with the most important instructions on a variety of subjects.

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes his brethren, 1, 2. He shows the blessings to which God had called them; and earnestly exhorts them to diligence in every good work, in order to make "their calling and election sure;" intermixing suitable warnings and encouragements, 3—11. He states, that, aware of his approaching martyrdom, he is the more diligent, in thus admonishing them, that they might remember these things after his decease, 12—15. He urges the evidence of his testimony seen and heard "in the holy mount," in confirmation of his testimony concerning the power and coming of Christ, 16—18; referring them to the "more sure word of prophecy,"<sup>19</sup>; and instructing them, concerning the interpretation and source of it, 20, 21.

2 <sup>f</sup> Grace and peace be multiplied unto you, through <sup>g</sup> the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord;

Note.—Perhaps Peter deemed it proper to style himself "an apostle," as well as "a servant, of Christ;" because he meant in this epistle to oppose certain false teachers, who did great mischief in the church. He addressed himself to "them who had obtained like precious faith with him" and his brethren. The nature and effects of true faith are "precious," and it interests the possessor in the most valuable blessings; it was therefore equally precious in a private Christian, and in an apostle. Thus he tacitly distinguished "the faith of God's elect," from that dead and worthless faith, by which many were deluded. (Notes, Tit. 1:1—4. Jam. 2:14—26.) This faith, which as the original intimates, they received by the special favor and allotment of God, rested on "the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ," as the words may be literally rendered. (Marg.) Thus they were taught to believe and trust in the obedience unto death of the Lord Jesus, as their incarnate God and Saviour, for their justification, and for all the blessings connected with it, and resulting from it. This is the most obvious meaning of the words; but if any contend that the expression "our God" refers to the Father; they should also remember that the meritorious obedience of the incarnate Son is often called "the righteousness of God." (Notes, Rom. 1:17. 3:21—26. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Phil. 3:8—11.) Nor can we form any idea, in what sense a Christian's faith could be said to be either in, or "through, the righteousness," or justice of God, considered merely as a divine attribute; when it rests mainly on the mercy and truth of God, and only views his justice as satisfied, and, as it were, consenting to the sinner's salvation, through the meritorious work of Christ.—Our translation "through the righteousness," though it seems not to be the exact sense of the passage, yet conveys a very important meaning: as the faith, by which we receive Christ for salvation, is given to us "through the righteousness," which he finished as our Surety; for it springs from the regeneration of the Holy Spirit, as given to us through his mediation. (Note, John 1:10—12.)—In behalf, however, of all such Christians, the apostle prayed, that "grace and peace might be multiplied to them, through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord." (Notes, John 17:1—3. 2 Cor. 4:3—6.) For, in proportion to the degree of our believing; spiritual, and experimental knowledge of the perfections of God, in the harmony and glory of them, as displayed in the Person, character, and salvation of Jesus our Lord, all our gracious affections will be exercised; and our peace, hope, and consolation will abound, even as that knowledge abounds in us. (Notes, 3:17, 18. Col. 1:9—14.)

Simon (1) Σιμων. Acts 15:14. Some copies read Simon.—Through.] Ev. In, with, by, for, from, for the sake of; rarely through. The apostle Paul having used ev for several verses; when the idea of through occurred to him, changes ev for dia with the genitive, (2 Cor. 6:4—8.) which is not observed in our version. (Comp. 3 with 3:18. Gr.)

4 Whereby <sup>n</sup> are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises; that by these <sup>o</sup> ye might be partakers of the divine nature, <sup>p</sup> having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—It might be expected by Christians, that the progressive work of illumination, sanctification, and consolation, would be carried on in them, according to what "the divine power" of the Lord Jesus had already conferred. (Note, Eph. 3:20, 21.) In consequence of his exaltation, and mediatorial authority, "his divine power" had given to his people "all things pertaining to life and godliness;" whatever was requisite for their spiritual and eternal life and final felicity, and for their acting suitably to their relations and obligations to God, during their passage through this evil world to heaven. Instructions, motives, encouragements, means, principles, and assistances, together with pardon, peace, and grace, had been "given them," through the regeneration of the Holy Spirit; and all the fulness of Christ, and the engagements of the everlasting covenant, had been set before them "in the word of the gospel;" so that, notwithstanding inward and outward impediments and conflicts, they might still be enabled to serve God acceptably in this world, and obtain everlasting life in the world to come. (Notes, Tit. 2:11—14.) All these things had been freely bestowed on them, "through the knowledge of God, who had called them" by his glorious grace and mercy, and the "virtue," or energy, of his quickening Spirit: or, he had called them to partake of "his eternal glory," and to a constant and courageous profession of the gospel, and obedience to Christ, amidst all the trials and sufferings of their present state. For the words "glory and virtue," may either refer to God who called them, or that to which they were called: the former seems the more literal construction; but the unusual use of the word rendered virtue, in applying it to God, has induced most expositors to adopt the latter interpretation. Yet the same word is used, in this application of it, by St. Peter in another place. (1 Pet. 2:9. Gr.)—By this "knowledge of God" in Christ, through the gospel, and by their efficacious calling, "exceedingly great and precious promises had been given them."—The promises of scripture relate to things most needful to sinners, suitable to their case, answerable to all their wants, and abundantly sufficient when fulfilled to them, as believers, to render them most blessed for evermore. Whereas, without the promises they must have been for ever miserable: they are therefore "exceedingly great and precious" even beyond expression. These are set before men, by the gospel, who are invited to come and partake of the promised blessings: but they are given to believers alone who may consider them as so many valuable securities, or good bills, payable when their circumstances and best interests render it necessary: for, being united to Christ, and partakers of him, all the promises belong to them through him and by his covenant. (Note, 2 Cor. 1:17—20.)—They were moreover bestowed on them, to the end that they "might be partakers of the divine nature," instead of that depraved and diabolical nature, which they had as apostate sinners; that, by their union with Christ, and the indwelling and new-creating power of the Holy Spirit, the divine image might be renewed upon their souls; that so a new nature might be formed within them, and a new direction given to their understandings, wills, and affections; conformable to the holy nature of God, and capable of loving and delighting in him, and finding happiness in his service. (Notes, Gen. 1:26,27. Rom. 12:2. 2 Cor. 3:17,18. Eph. 4:20—24. Col. 3:7—11.) When this change of heart and nature was begun in regeneration, it influenced those who experienced it, to separate "and escape from the pollution that was in the world through lust;" or from all those outward vices and enormities, into which men are drawn, by their excessive and idolatrous cravings after the pleasures, possessions, or distinctions of the world. Such evil practices have always filled the earth, and they are pollution and filthiness in the judgment of God.—When sinners profess to repent, and to embrace the gospel, they outwardly relinquish these iniquities: (Notes, 2:20—22. Matt. 12:43—45.) and all regenerate persons actually and finally escape them; that is, the allowed or habitual, practice of any of them.

Note.—The apostle here called on his Christian brethren, not to rest in their apparent conversion, or the reformation connected with it, or even in the beginning of a renewal to a "divine nature;" but, depending on the promises, of the gospel, and pursuing the end for which they were given, to "cleanse themselves from all" remaining "filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God." (Note, 2 Cor. 7:1.) Beyond, and as continuing and completing, that renewal which had already taken place, they ought to "give all diligence," in the use of every appointed means, from an earnest desire of increasing holiness; and thus "to add to their faith, virtue," that they might, with fortitude and manly constancy, profess faith in Christ, and obey his will, in the midst of persecutors; and display firmness and composure of mind, notwithstanding the difficulties and dangers to which they were exposed. They ought, furthermore, diligently "to add to their virtue, knowledge;" that, by an increasing acquaintance with the whole truth and will of God, they might be enabled to regulate their zeal and courage, with judgment and discretion: knowing how to behave in all circumstances, and towards all men; like well informed intelligent persons, who could not justly be charged with any thing rash, foolish, or contrary to the duty and propriety of their relations and station, in the church or the community. (Note, Phil. 1:9—11.) To “knowledge” they must add “temperance,” or an exact government of all the animal appetites, in subordination to the will of God, and the benefit of themselves and others; as well as great moderation in all worldly things, and indifference about them. To “temperance” they must unite “patience,” or a cheerful submission to the will of God under afflictions, meekness amidst injuries and affronts, perseverance in well doing notwithstanding severe trials, and a quiet waiting for the Lord, to interpose for their comfort and deliverance. To this “godliness” must be added; as consisting of all those holy affections and dispositions, which constitute the spiritual worshipper and truly devoted servant of God, “in all his ordinances and commandments:” (1 Tim. 4:6—10. 6:6—10.) and to this, “brotherly kindness,” or an unfeigned fervent love of Christians, as brethren in the Lord. (Notes, Heb. 13:1—3. 1 Pet. 1:22—25.) To all the rest they must join “charity,” or benevolent and compassionate love to all men, expansive and universal philanthropy, or “good-will to men,” according to the commandments of God, and in imitation of his kindness to our fallen race. (Notes, Luke 2:8—14. Tit. 3:4—7.) These holy dispositions, and the effects of them upon their conduct, must be diligently and carefully added together, as different voices in harmony form a chorus: that so, the exercise of each other might regulate, and bound, and unite with that of the rest, and prevent their exceeding or degenerating. Thus, the Christian character would appear well proportioned, and beautiful; whereas, if any of these graces were remarkably defective, the others would appear to be redundant; being joined with those natural dispositions, which most resembled them: and the character would appear deformed and destitute of symmetry; whilst one man would be bold without knowledge or love; another, gentle and kind, without firmness or fortitude. The same disproportion would appear in various other particulars.—It is evident, that none of the genuine graces of the Christian character can exist alone: all combine in forming it; but symmetry is the source of beauty. (Notes, Matt. 5:3. Gal. 5:22—26.) forgotten <sup>i</sup> that he was purged from his old sins.

Note.—These things ought to be peculiarly attended to; as the usefulness and comfort of Christians greatly depended upon them. For if holy affections and dispositions were rooted in their hearts, and “abounded” in their lives, these would effectually prevent them from being “slothful or unfruitful in their knowledge of Christ:” as they would excite them to continual activity in his service; and to that behavior in all relative duties, and in the improvement of their talents, which would be very useful to mankind. (Notes, Heb. 6:9—12.) But, on the other hand, the professed Christian, who was destitute of these holy dispositions, was to be considered as spiritually “blind:” for his most exact notions only showed, that he had heard that such things were; but his conduct proved that he had never seen or understood the real nature, use, glory, and excellency of them. At least, if greatly deficient in them, he must be very “short-sighted,” and incapable of perceiving any thing of the genuine tendency of the gospel: nay, he had forgotten the very meaning of his own profession, when he embraced Christianity, and was baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus; as baptism represented the purging away of a man’s old sins, in conformity to the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ, that, being dead unto sin, and risen to newness of life, he might thenceforth live unto God. Note.—No outward profession of Christianity could profit men, without the renewal of their hearts to holiness: the apostle therefore exhorted his brethren, “the rather to give diligence, to make their calling and election sure;” that, by earnestly and vigorously using every means of grace, applying themselves to the performance of all their various duties, mortifying every sinful propensity, and cultivating every holy affection; the evidence of their “calling,” or regeneration and conversion, might become complete, clear, and indisputable to themselves, as well as to others. (Note, 1 John 2:3—6.) For if they diligently practised those things which had been mentioned, they should "never fall;" it would thus be manifest that they were true believers, who would be preserved from total and final apostacy, into which many professed Christians were drawn: and, in proportion to their diligence, they would be kept from the snares of Satan, and from falling into such sins, as would be a scandal to the gospel, and very distressing to themselves. Thus they would be preserved in a comfortable and honorable walk with God, and from all those declensions and failures, into which others were betrayed: and when they left the world, "an entrance would be granted to them into the everlasting kingdom of Christ;" every thing would be so arranged as to conduce to their felicity; they would be favored at the approach of death, with satisfactory assurance that they were going to heaven; they would enter that blessed estate, as a ship comes into harbor, richly laden from a prosperous voyage, with a fair gale and a full tide, carrying it above all impediments, and terminating all its dangers; and those who were left behind would have no doubt of their being gone to be with Christ, in his glorious and eternal kingdom. (Note, Heb. 4:1,2.) Whereas inconsistent professors of the gospel would probably have darkness and doubt for their companions in the hour of death; others would be disposed to hesitate in respect of the event; and in many ways they must suffer loss, even though they were "saved as by fire." things, <sup>u</sup> though ye know them, <sup>x</sup> and be established in the present truth.

15 Moreover, <sup>d</sup> I will endeavor that ye may be able, after my decease, to have <sup>e</sup> these things always in remembrance.

Note.—Seeing things were as it had been stated, the apostle assured his brethren, that he would not be negligent in his duty; but would embrace every opportunity of "putting them in remembrance" of these important matters: even "though they knew them, and were established," especially in that truth which he then inculcated; namely, the necessity of diligence and holiness, in order to assurance of their "calling and election," and to "an abundant entrance into the eternal kingdom of Christ." (Note, 3:1—4.) This was the case with many, who would be glad to have their memories refreshed, and their holy affections invigorated, by his animated exhortations: but others might be in a declining or wavering frame of mind; especially as many teachers propagated opinions of a contrary tendency. The apostle, however, deemed it "meet," right, and a debt owing to his brethren, so long as he sojourned in the frail body, as in a tabernacle, (Note, 2 Cor. 5:1—4.) to stir them up to increasing and persevering diligence in every good work; by putting them in remembrance of those truths, which they had before learned, but were too apt to forget. To this he was excited by the assurance that his death speedily approached; (Preface to Deut.—Note, Deut. 33:1. Josh. 23:24: 1 Chr. 29: John 13:—17: 2 Tim. 4:1—8.) when his body would be taken down like a tent; or laid aside as a garment, by one who was going to rest; not indeed by a natural dissolution, but by a violent death, as his beloved Lord had showed him long before. (Note, John 21:18—23.)—The composure with which Peter, on this occasion, spoke of the execruciating death which awaited him, as if it had been no more than putting off his garment, or removing his tent, may very properly be contrasted with his terror, and denial of his Lord, when he had been left to himself in order to his humiliation. (Notes, Matt. 26:30—35,69—75.)—Until the very time of his death should arrive, it would be his chief concern and endeavor, to use every means, that each individual might after his decease, have these practical instructions in remembrance.—Though he wrote to the churches in Asia, yet he evidently intended his exhortations for the benefit of Christians in other ages and nations; and we still have his words "in our remembrance." (Note, John 15:12—16. P. O. 9—16.)—The insufficiency of oral tradition is clearly shown, by the apostle's earnestness to convey his admonitions in writing.

18 And <sup>o</sup> this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in <sup>p</sup> the holy mount.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle was prepared to lay down his life, in attestation to the gospel, and earnest to establish others in the faith; because he was conscious and confident, that he, and other ministers of Christ, had not followed artful and ingenious "fables, cunningly devised" for the purpose of soothing men's passions, and gratifying their depraved inclinations; and thus advancing the persons who propagated them, to wealth, authority, or reputation. This had been the nature, intention, and effect of many of the Pagan fictions, and the inventions of Jewish rabbies: and indeed this, in one way or other, is the object of all those, who invent and propagate false or perverted systems of religion. But there was nothing of this nature in the doctrine taught by the apostles, concerning the power and authority to which Christ had been advanced in consequence of his crucifixion and resurrection, and the ends for which he reigned; or in what related to his "second coming to judge the world," to perfect the salvation of his disciples, and to execute vengeance on his enemies. These doctrines were not suited to please carnal men, or to procure secular advantages to those who taught them: indeed such instructions would certainly offend those who were not brought to repentance, faith, and holiness; but they were authenticated in the most satisfactory manner. For Peter, with James and John, had been eye-witnesses of their Lord's "majesty," even during the season appointed for his humiliation. His essential dignity, and his approaching mediatorial exaltation, were manifest in the splendor of his countenance; and in the appearance of Moses and Elias, to surrender up their honors to him, at his transfiguration. But especially, he received the most distinguishing honor and glory from "God the Father;" when there was heard from the bright cloud, the symbol of the divine Presence in transcendent glory, a voice saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;" and the apostle himself, together with his brethren, had "heard this voice from heaven," when he accompanied the Lord Jesus to the mount of transfiguration; which was properly called "holy," from this signal display of the divine majesty upon it. (Notes, Ex. 3:4,5. Matt. 3:16,17. 17:1—8.)

19 We have also <sup>a</sup> a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto <sup>r</sup> ye do well that ye take heed, as unto <sup>s</sup> a light that shineth in a dark place, until <sup>t</sup> the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts:

Note.—The recollection of the transfiguration of Christ, gave great confidence personally to the apostle, which was indeed especially intended; and his testimony concerning it might be a great confirmation of the faith of other Christians: yet, they had also "a more sure word of prophecy." The appearance and voice on the mount were transient, and only three persons witnessed the interesting scene; one of whom had long before been martyred. (Note, Acts 12:1—4.) Whatever assurance, therefore, it might bring to the individuals concerned; it was not so well suited fully to satisfy the minds of men in general, as the prophecies of scripture were. These, from the beginning, at least from Adam's fall, (Note, Gen. 3:14, 15.) had foretold and described one extraordinary Person; and given intimations of his birth, character, miracles, doctrines, sufferings, death, resurrection, and exaltation; together with the establishment, extent, prosperity, and duration of his kingdom, and his final coming to judgment. And when they were compared with the accomplishment of them in Jesus of Nazareth, they constituted a permanent and general proof, unanswerably conclusive, that he was "the Messiah," "the Son of God," and "the Saviour of the world." Thus the prophecies more powerfully corroborated the doctrine of the apostles, concerning his exaltation and second coming, than any thing which Peter had seen on the mount could do: not indeed to him personally, or to James and John, who witnessed the transfiguration; but to men in general. So that the more "this word of prophecy" should be considered, the fuller conviction would it communicate. To this, therefore, all who read the epistle would "do well" to give peculiar attention: for it was to be considered "as a light shining in a dark place," not only in respect of the total ignorance of the Gentiles, and the comparative darkness of the Mosaic economy; but as the earth has been at all times a dark place, except where the word of God has diffused light in it, by leading men to Christ, "the Light of the world." Christians ought therefore to attend to the prophecies of scripture, for their direction and conviction, concerning the truth of the Christian religion; till the Holy Spirit should discover to their souls the glory and excellency of the gospel, and, by his sanctifying and comfortable influences, give them "the dawning" of heaven in their hearts; and, till the knowledge of Christ, and the experience of his power, truth, and love, had formed, within them, an assurance, and anticipation of the light, holiness, and felicity of the saints, in the presence of their glorified Saviour; even as the morning star preceded and ushered in the rising Sun and "the perfect day." (Notes, Prov. 4: 18,19. Hos. 6:1—3. 2 Cor. 1:21,22. 4:5,6.) Nothing can be more manifest, than that the "day-dawn and day-star arise in the hearts" of true Christians; and that no external or what is not improperly called internal evidence of the divine original of Christianity, is meant. The internal evidence of the divine inspiration of the scriptures signifies the evidence of divinity which they contain in themselves: but "the day-dawn, and day-star in our hearts" must mean what is internal in our own experience; "the secret of the Lord, which is with them that fear him." (Notes, Ps. 25:14. 63:5—8. John 14:18—24. Rev. 2:17.) The unnatural and far-fetched interpretations of those, who oppose this conclusion, serve only to confirm the author in his judgment.—This inward demonstration of the truth of Christianity would render the external evidences less necessary to those who enjoyed it: as they could no longer doubt of it, when they saw the glory, and tasted the comfort of it, and experienced the truth and power of it in their hearts, and manifested it in their conduct. (Note, 1 John 5:9,10.)

Note.—In "taking heed to this light," Christians must first "know," as a matter of the greatest importance, that "no prophecy of scripture is of any private interpretation." This clause has been variously explained. Some render it, 'of any private impulse,' as if it related rather to the giving, than the interpreting of prophecy: but the word cannot properly be so rendered, as it implies the loosing of a knot: and it would also render the next verse, a mere repetition of the same thought; and that in the form of a reason assigned for what went before, which is very unnatural.—Many have opposed the text to the right of private judgment, in order to support a supposed authority inherent, somewhere, in the church and its ministers; and to make them the ultimate object of faith, by fixing the sense of the scriptures for the people: yet, at last, this is as much private interpretation as any other can be; for every church and its ministers put their own meaning upon the word of God, and that often contrary to the truth. Some have referred the words to the general application of scriptural promises by believers to their own case; as being a common property of the church, and not the appropriate exclusive right of the individuals to whom they were at first given. But the apostle was not discoursing of promises; as his argument relates entirely to predictions: and this indeed seems to point out the true meaning. The lively imaginations and inventive genius of men often lead them to suppose events to be accomplishments of scriptural prophecies, which in fact have no direct relation to them: and this way of misapplying them, as fancy, inclination, system, or external transient appearances may dictate, has always tended to render prophecies suspected or disregarded. Instead then of employing a lively imagination or superior genius, to discover some agreement between our own private concerns, or those of our party, or the events of the day, and the predictions of scripture; and so attempting to foretell future events from them; we should remember, and be assured, that every prophecy has its precise and determinate meaning, which no human ingenuity can alter. We ought therefore to exercise our judgment, with proper help, and in dependence on divine teaching, to discover, as far as we can, the real meaning of the predictions, and the accomplishment of them in the public concerns of Christ and his church, and in those of the world as connected with the church: and to rest satisfied with understanding such as have evidently been fulfilled; without too curiously prying into those which appear to be hitherto unaccomplished. Thus the perversion of prophecy would be prevented, and the objections against the argument brought from it, in proof of the divine inspiration of the scriptures, would be fully obviated. The prophecies, which have been already most evidently fulfilled, in the Person and salvation of Christ, and in the grand concerns of the church and of the world, form a most unanswerable demonstration of the truth of Christianity; and the accumulating evidence, arising from the fulfilment of further prophecies, from age to age, must at last rouse the attention of the most heedless, and silence the cavils of the most skeptical. But the misapplication of prophecy, as if it were "of private interpretation;" and as if every man were at liberty to put his own fanciful meaning upon it, only serves to furnish objections, gives the whole an air of uncertainty, and so exceedingly perplexes the subject.—For "the prophecy came not in ancient times," at the instance and according to the inclinations of men, nor can it be properly thus interpreted: but the events, to which it related, were fixed in the eternal counsels of God, to be accomplished in their appointed season "Holy men of God," who served him, and were specially favored by him, "spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit;" and they were so far from modelling their predictions according to their inclinations, that they frequently could not discover the meaning of their own words. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.)—The author has lately been led to consider

Bishop Horsley's view of this subject: but he can only say, that it has not in the least made him doubt of the truth of the interpretation above given.—The apostle intended the prophecies of the Old Testament; but his arguments are equally conclusive respecting those of the New Testament also: and the close is a most decisive attestation to the divine inspiration of the scriptures.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

We should carefully examine, whether our faith be of a "like precious" nature and efficacy, with that of the primitive servants of Jesus Christ: for if we have "obtained" this inestimable benefit, we are certainly interested in "the righteousness of our God and Saviour;" and "grace and peace will be multiplied unto us," in proportion to "our knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord," till the whole is perfected in the felicity of heaven. We can expect nothing too great and valuable from him, whose "divine power hath already given us all things pertaining to life and godliness; through the knowledge of him who hath called us" by his new-creating Spirit, in order to bring us to his "everlasting glory." "Exceedingly great and precious promises" are contained in his holy word; so that if we have the "precious faith," which embraces and relies on the promises, and which renders Christ precious to the soul; we possess all that is essentially valuable; and need not desire those trifles, which carnal men idolize, as if they comprised the substance of all happiness. But let us remember, that these promises were given to us, in order to our being "partakers of a divine nature:" and this will induce us to inquire, whether we really "flee from the pollutions, which are in the world, through the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life;" and whether we be really "renewed in the spirit of our minds." It will also teach us to convert all these promises into prayers, for the purifying and transforming grace of the Holy Spirit, to make us indeed partakers, more and more, of the image of God in righteousness, goodness, and truth.

V. 5—11.

It is incumbent on us to "give all diligence, to add to our faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity;" that it may appear, that we are one with Christ, and with the Father through him. (Notes, John 17:20—23.) When these graces dwell in the heart, and abound in the conduct, they constitute a consistent, active, and fruitful Christian: and a degree of zeal and diligence in "good works," to which other men are strangers, will show the excellency of those doctrines, which many ignorantly suppose to lead to licentiousness. But "the light which is in" numbers, even of those who profess the gospel, "is darkness:" (Notes, Matt. 6:22, 23. Tit. 1:14—16.) and, while they boast themselves to be more clear-sighted than practical Christians and teachers, their own deficiency, in the graces and good works of true religion, proves them to be "blind," or at least very dim-sighted; men who can see nothing, but a few things belonging to their own narrow system, without perceiving the enlarged nature and beneficent tendency of the gospel; who have forgotten, that even baptism signifies 'a death 'unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness;' and that Christians, by their very profession, are bound 'to mortify all evil and corrupt affections, and daily to proceed in all virtue and godliness of living.' As, therefore, so many "are pure in their own eyes, who are not washed from their filthiness;" (Notes, Prov. 14:12. 16:2. 30:11—14.) and as every one of Christ's apostles bears most decided testimony against such a worthless form of knowledge, such a dead and solitary faith; (Notes, Gal. 5:1—6, 13—18. 6:6—10. Jam. 2:19—26. 1 John 3:7—10. Jude 3,8.) "we ought the rather to give diligence to make our calling and election sure." Many indeed presume themselves to be elect, because they believe the doctrine of election, according to their notions on that subject; though they have no evidence, that "God hath called them with a holy calling:" but, if we would not be deceived, we must diligently make sure to our souls, by the indisputable fruits of the Spirit, that we are called by regenerating and renewing grace; and we may thence safely infer our eternal election, and our final preservation. It is not said, that if we hold certain doctrines, we shall never fall; but "if we do these things, we shall never fall;" and, in the diligent and persevering practice of every good work, we should wait for "an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

It behoves all ministers, after the example of Peter, diligently and at all times to put their readers "in remembrance of the things" above mentioned, in connexion with evangelical truth: otherwise they cannot "take them to record, that they are pure from their blood, having declared unto them all the counsel of God," however exactly they have preached the doctrines of grace. (Notes, Acts 20:18—27.) This is not only necessary, with such as are ignorant or waver in these matters; but even among those "who know them, and are;" as to their judgment, "established" in them: for allowed truths often lie dormant in the mind, except as they are rendered active by animated exhortations: and a carnal mind renders the memory treacherous in this respect, so that it soon loses sight of spiritual instructions. (Notes, Prov. 2:1—8. Matt. 13:18,19. Heb. 3:1—6.) These practical subjects, however, do not always prove most acceptable to the majority, in congregations where the doctrines of grace are preached: so that ministers will often be tempted to omit them, or to hurry them over, in a general and superficial manner; which exceedingly tends to deceive souls, and to diffuse a false and loose religion. We are therefore bound in justice to men, as well as in duty to God, "as long as we are in these tabernacles," to "stir up" our people, and all to whom we have access, "by putting them in remembrance" of the various good works, by which they must glorify God and adorn the gospel; and to consult what is profitable, rather than what is pleasant to them. For "we shall shortly put off these our tabernacles:" and, when we are advanced in years, feel the infirmities of decaying nature, and have outlived most of our contemporaries, we do not need any revelation to assure us, that this is even now at hand. Yet at this period, the age and influence of a consistent minister often gives him peculiar advantages for usefulness. These should be improved with alacrity, promptitude, and self-denying earnestness, as there "is no work, nor wisdom, in the grave whither we are going;" (Notes, Ec. 9:10. John 9:4—7. Col. 3:16,17.) after the example of Moses, Joshua, David, the apostle Peter, his "well beloved brother Paul," and even the Lord Jesus himself; and not according to the custom of too many, who relax their diligence, at the very time when it would be most impressive, and the greatest blessing might be expected. Yet nothing can tend so much to produce composure in the prospect or in the pangs of death, and in expectation of our great account, as consciousness that we have not sought to please men, or to obtain wealth, reputation, ease, or indulgence to ourselves; but that we have faithfully and simply and perseveringly served the Lord Jesus Christ, and sought his glory, and the salvation of souls, as the great aim of all our labors. Indeed the speedy approach of death should excite us, not only to prepare to meet it with comfort; but to use every proper means, that all around us may have the substance of our instructions in remembrance after our decease. Nor are ministers alone concerned in this: parents, tutors, school-masters, even to the teachers of charity-schools and Sunday-schools, have an important opportunity of usefulness in these respects; and an awful responsibility attached to their several employments. We cannot indeed expect such extensive and permanent success, to our feeble and defective endeavors, as has crowned the writings of inspired men of God: yet, when we are conscious, that our testimony tends to lead men to the scriptures, to Christ, and to holiness, we may hope that abiding good will spring from them: whilst many of the admired productions of ingenious infidels, heretics, and ungodly men, will continue to corrupt the principles, to deprave the morals, and to murder the souls of numbers, from age to age; to the accumulating guilt and condemnation of those, who left so fatal a bequest to posterity. For whatever clamors may be raised about bigotry and uncharitableness; it is most certain, that they only, who preach salvation for sinners through Jesus Christ, and who make "known his power and coming to judge the world," are free from the charge of following cunningly devised fables; and therefore they ought to be the most earnest in their labors, without regarding what the consequence may be respecting their temporal interests. For even those things, of which the apostles, or some of them, were eyewitnesses, concerning the majesty and glory of Christ; and what they "heard from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;" are full of conviction, instruction, and encouragement to us, at this day, to direct and animate us in the work of the Lord.

V. 19—21.

We have not seen or heard such things, as the apostles did: but "we have a more sure word of prophecy," which will fully satisfy the diligent investigator, even more than any transient miracle could do; as it lies open to every man's examination, and continually becomes more conclusive, by the further accomplishment of its predictions. To this grand evidence of the truth of Christianity, and its great doctrines, every serious inquirer will "do well to take heed;" especially in this skeptical age, when so many engines are at work, to draw the attention of the unestablished from the gospel, as if it were "a cunningly devised fable." In this way then, let such persons wait, and, taking heed to this "light that shineth in a dark place," they will gradually be directed to Christ; and their experience of his power, truth, and love, will be "the day-dawn, and the day-star arising in their hearts;" and a sure earnest and foretaste of everlasting happiness.—But, "in searching the scriptures," and especially in considering the prophecies and their accomplishment, we should beware of self-confidence, party prejudices, ungoverned fancy, and the influence of selfish passions. We have indeed a right to judge for ourselves, and should call no man master on earth; but it is requisite we should exercise our judgment with sobriety, modesty, and docility: nor is it generally safe to indulge a fondness for novelty, or to deviate from the approved judgment of eminent servants of God, in other ages of the church, without evident necessity. Above all, we should examine these subjects with earnest prayer for the teaching of the same Spirit, by whom "holy men of God spake" their prophecies; that we may be enabled to discover what was his meaning in them, as far as that is good for us. Under his guidance, we shall be kept from interpreting scripture, according to our private fancy, humor, or inclination; we shall discover the relation, nearer or more remote, of all the prophecies to Christ and his church. We shall also perceive that so many of them have already been fulfilled, that we are fully authorized to expect the accomplishment of all the rest; till his second coming to judge the world, to perfect his people's salvation, and to shut up the wicked in hell, shall fulfil the last of these predictions, to the glory of his truth, power, love, wisdom, and righteousness, and the joy and admiration of all his redeemed people, in the sight of the whole assembled world of angels and men.

CHAP. II.

The apostle foretells the coming of false teachers; showing in general their corrupt principles and selfishness, and the fatal effects of their influence, 1—3. He induces the severity of God in punishing apostate angels, the inhabitants of the old world, and those of Sodom, with his kindness to Noah and Lot, in proof that he would certainly preserve his people, and execute vengeance on the wicked, 4—9. A more particular account of the seducers above mentioned, of their vile character and practices, and of the hopeless condition of many, who were deceived by them, 10—22.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—(Note, 1:20,21.) The false prophets opposed “the holy men of God;” under the old dispensation; and, by flattering and deceitful words, obtained a pernicious ascendancy over the minds of the people, and the rulers of Israel: (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, 1 Kings 22: 10—25. Is. 9:13—17. Jer. 5:30,31. 14:13—16. 23:9—40. 27:—29. Ez. 14.) and there would, in like manner, be “false teachers” in the Christian church, who, by similar methods, would draw off professed Christians from the holy doctrine of the apostles, and other faithful preachers. These deceivers would not at once openly and directly, but privily, oppose the leading truths of Christianity: they would work with unsuspected subtlety; and by degrees, under specious pretences, clandestinely introduce such false doctrines, as tended to subvert the very design of the gospel. (Notes, 2 Cor. 11:13—15. Gal. 2:1—5.) These heresies would make grievous divisions in the church, and end in the ‘swift destruction’ of those who were deceived by them, and of the deceivers especially. For they would “deny the Lord that bought them.” Men, professing to believe that the Lord Jesus “redeemed the church with his own blood,” (Notes, Acts 20:28. Gal. 3:6—14.) and considering themselves “as bought with” that inestimable “price;” instead of glorifying him by devoted obedience, would cast off his yoke, renounce his authority, and refuse to “have him to reign over them.”—It is not requisite to understand the apostle, as declaring, that the Lord Jesus had died, with an express intention of redeeming these very persons: it sufficed for his argument, that they denied him, as their Lord, in whom they professed to hope as a Redeemer; as all avowed Antinomians do. Thus Christ sometimes addressed the Pharisees according to their own mistaken notions, and argued with them from their own principles. (Notes, Luke 15:3—7,25—32.)—The inconsistency and base conduct of these false teachers was evident from their own profession; and it was not the manner of the sacred writers to express themselves with that systematic exactness, which many now affect. (Notes, Rom. 14:13—23. 1 Cor. 8:7—13.)—It appears very unnatural to explain the words “the Lord that bought them,” of Israel’s redemption from Egypt, which would never have been thought of, in this connexion, had not controversy led men to exercise their utmost ingenuity, to evade the arguments, and answer the objections, of their opponents. Thus attachment to a system leads men to do violence to the scriptures, and this deeply injures the cause, which they are so anxious to defend. Doubtless Christ intended to redeem those, and those only, who, he foresaw, would eventually be saved by faith in him: yet his ransom was of infinite sufficiency, the proposal of it in scripture is general, and men are continually addressed, according to their profession, even when it is intimated that they are not upright in it. (1:9.)—The false teachers, by denying, or refusing to obey, him as their Lord and King, whom they professed to trust in as their Redeemer, and by teaching others their abominable doctrines, were “bringing on themselves swift destruction,” which would come on them unawares and suddenly. But, in the mean time, many would “follow their pernicious ways,” or destructions; imbibing their poisonous principles, and copying their base examples; “by reason of whom the way of truth would be blasphemed” by ignorant persons, who would conclude that Christians in general held these licentious doctrines, and that they secretly indulged themselves in wickedness, though only some of them were detected, or were bold enough to avow it. In this manner, by flattery, and false pretences to love, zeal, and attachment to evangelical doctrines, they would pay court to men’s passions and carnal inclinations in order to gratify their own avarice; and so they would carry on a base merchandise for the souls of the people, consigning them to destruction in order to enrich themselves. (Notes and P. O. Is. 56:9—12. Notes, Rom. 16:17—20. 2 Cor. 11:16—20. Phil. 2:17—19. 6:6—10. 1 Tim. 3:1—5. Tit. 1:10—13. Rev. 18:11—19. P. O. 9—19.) But, whilst they thus prospered by their “damnable heresies;” and hoped for impunity in their crimes; the punishment intended for them had long before been predicted; the place of torment had been of old prepared; the judgment by which they would be condemned did not linger, and the vengeance of God, which would certainly consign them to eternal destruction, did by no means “slumber.” Indeed, the Lord bore with them in his long-suffering, till his own holy purposes should be effected, and their measure of iniquity filled up: and they inferred, that the predicted “judgment lingered;” and the threatened “damnation slumbered;” but the event would soon awfully undeceive them. (Note, 3:1—4.)—Learned men have maintained discordant opinions, concerning the heretics whom the apostle especially intended: but probably he used general language designedly, that the description might suit various kinds of false teachers, in that and in all future ages.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The method, in which the Lord proceeded in such cases, might evidently be collected from past examples. When angels, who were created of a far superior order to men, sinned against God; he showed them no mercy, and exercised no compassion towards them: but, on the first instance of their rebellion, "he cast them down," as guilty and polluted, from his holy habitation in heaven; and allotted them their residence and portion in "hell," even in that place of torment, which his righteous vengeance had prepared for them, and their great ringleader in rebellion. (Matt. 25:41.) Thus they were bound as criminals, and reserved to take their trial at the day of judgment; when sentence will be openly passed, and finally executed upon them. (Notes, Rev. 20:1—3, 7—10.) In the mean time their incurable enmity and wickedness, and the omnipresent and omnipotent justice of God, hold them fast, as "in chains of darkness," misery, and despair, from which there can be no possible escape. Their doom is therefore irreversible: though the Lord, for wise reasons, lengthens their chains, enlarges the bounds of their prison, and defers the extremity of their punishment; which respite and relaxation they employ, in opposing to the uttermost his purposes of love to mankind, and in attempting their destruction. (Notes, Gen. 3:1—6,14,15. Job 1:6—11. 2:1—5. Zech. 3:1—4. John 8:41—47. 2 Cor. 4:3,4. Rev. 12:7—12.) But this will all be overruled for the fuller display of the glory of God, the accomplishment of his eternal counsels, and the more conspicuous exercise of his awful justice, in the everlasting misery of these implacable enemies.—Thus he would also bear with the false teachers above mentioned, till their impiety and enmity were sufficiently evinced: and when his wise and holy purposes were accomplished, he would execute deserved vengeance upon them and their adherents; and so terminate the temptation, to which his people were exposed through their artifices. (Note, 2 Tim. 3:6—9.)—The same instructions might be deduced from the Lord's dealings with the old world. He had indeed preserved "Noah, the eighth person;" (seven others having been saved with him, for his sake, in the Ark which he had prepared;) and during the hundred and twenty years of his long-suffering, Noah had been "a preacher of righteousness" to that corrupt generation among whom he lived, which must have exposed him to manifold trials and temptations; as none, that we know of, were brought to repentance, faith in the promised Saviour, and obedience to God, by his long continued labors. So that, at length, the Lord executed the vengeance denounced, and spared none of all the millions who then lived on earth: but by bringing in the deluge he destroyed them all; "and Noah only remained alive, and they that were with him in the ark." (Notes, Gen. 6:7: Ez. 14:13—20. Heb. 11:7. 1 Pet. 3:19,20.)—In like manner, the Lord, after having long borne with the extreme wickedness of Sodom, till their measure of sin was filled up; at length, when they did not at all expect it, sent fire from heaven to burn their cities and all the inhabitants of them; that the tremendous overthrow, to which they were condemned, might be a solemn warning and an instructive "example, to all" those in future ages, who should live in ungodliness and wickedness. (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, Gen. 19:.) Yet at the same time the Lord delivered, in a most gracious and wonderful manner, "righteous Lot," from the destruction of his neighbors. For though he had been very faulty in many respects, and was severely corrected; yet, being a true believer and a justified servant of God, he was taken care of, and brought out of Sodom before it was destroyed. He had indeed, from carnal motives, gone to reside in that wicked place, and had very pertinaciously adhered to the foolish choice which he had made; (Notes, Gen. 13:14:.) but he was extremely uneasy there, being continually "vexed and harassed" by the filthy conduct and discourse of the abandoned Sodomites, and their clamorous and furious opposition to his counsels and instructions. What he saw and heard of their unlawful and hateful crimes, caused his "righteous soul" daily vexation and inquietude; seeing he could not prevail in any degree to stop the inundation of their wickedness. But this disposition to hate, avoid, and be troubled for the sins of his neighbors, joined to his general conduct, proved him to be a pious man: and therefore, whilst he was stripped of his possessions, as a correction for his sin, and his family was either destroyed, or greatly corrupted and disgraced by means of it; the Lord mercifully "snatched him as a brand out of the burning," and saved him from so perilous and ensnaring a situation. These examples, therefore, sufficiently showed that the "Lord knew how," in the best time and manner, to "deliver the godly out of temptation," to rescue them from the most formidable dangers, in a critical moment; to distinguish the most feeble and defective of them, from their ungodly neighbors; and to arrange all his dispensations in the best manner for their salvation. This he has engaged to do; and his wisdom must be trusted, to select the best time and manner of performing his faithful promises, which cannot fail, whatever appearances may be. But he also "knows how to reserve the unrighteous to the day of judgment to be punished;" whilst he bears with them, and permits them to prosper in vice, they are bound, as it were, in the 'chains of their sins,' and shut up in the dungeon of his immutable justice, till "the day of his wrath;" when he will bring them forth to judgment, and execute on them the most terrible punishment, because of his long patience with them, and their perverse abuse of it. 11 Whereas <sup>s</sup> angels, which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accusation † against them before the Lord.

licable to all wicked men; but especially to hypocritical and heretical professors and teachers of Christianity: yet they were, and would be, peculiarly verified in the licentious heresiarchs, of whom the apostle treated, and in that of their abandoned followers. These habitually "walked after the flesh," and indulged their sensual appetites "in the lust of uncleanness;" as if they had proposed to themselves the inhabitants of Sodom for an example: and while they exercised no government over their own passions and inclinations, they "despised the government" of others. They denied Christ, in respect of his kingly office, and would not obey him as their Lord and Master; (Note, 1-3.) and we may suppose, that they contemptuously disregarded the spiritual authority of the apostles, and other pastors and rulers of the church. (Notes, 1 John 4:4-6. 3 John 9-12.) They seem also to have treated civil government with scorn, as if they were determined, like genuine "sons of Belial," to cast off every yoke, and to be wholly their own masters! For they were "presumptuous," self-confident, destitute of any due regard to God, aspiring to pre-eminence, and supposing themselves authorized to do whatever they chose. They were "self-willed," determined to follow the impulse of their own mind; proudly set against counsel, not to be influenced by argument, disregarding all consequences, and bent upon their own rash and foolish purposes. (Notes, 2 Tim. 3:1-5.) They were, therefore, not afraid to "revile dignities," in a slanderous manner; and, instead of honoring the persons and authority of those in exalted stations, according to the word of God, and as his ministers and representatives; they calumniated and railed at them, without fear of consequences: and doing these things under the pretence of religion, they exposed Christianity to scandal, and gave plausibility to the accusations and persecutions of their enemies. (Notes, Rom. 13:1-7. Tit. 2:1,2. 1 Pet. 2:13-17.)—But angels, who were far greater and more powerful than men, and perfect in holiness, did not act thus in respect of the governors of the earth: for, though, as ministers of Providence, they reported to the Lord the execution of their commission, with respect even to kings and rulers; they did not bring any virulent or bitter accusations against them; but stated facts as they were, and respected them as God's vicegerents: though they could not but abhor the crimes which they often witnessed, and sometimes were employed to punish. So that, the professors of Christianity, who slandered and reviled "dignities," did not copy the example of holy angels, but rather that of Satan, the false accuser of men in the presence of God. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The heretics, here described, were like “natural brute beasts” which, being bent on the gratification of their appetites, rage against all who oppose them, and are ready to devour them. And as savage beasts seem created only “to be taken and destroyed,” to prevent the havoc which they might otherwise make of the human species; so, these seducers would certainly expose themselves to destruction; nay, they would be proscribed as nuisances, and enemies to the community. Satan had caught them with his baits, and “taken them captive at his will;” (Note, 2 Tim. 2:23—26.) and they were in the way to eternal destruction. For, being impatient of counsel or control, they uttered vehement revilings against the persons, authority, laws, and measures of their rulers, which they were incompetent to understand, or had never sufficiently examined; and in so doing, they incurred both the displeasure of princes, and the wrath of God also; and thus would utterly perish by their own corrupt practices. For, notwithstanding their vain conceit of imagined privileges, they would certainly “receive the reward of unrighteousness:” seeing their pleasure was not sought in obeying God, but in riotous feasting and intemperance, in which they indulged, even during the light of the day, without shame or remorse. (Note, 1 Thes. 5:4—11.) They were, therefore, “spots and blemishes,” who deformed and disgraced those Christian societies which did not expel them; whilst they wantonly sported themselves, and indulged a kind of insulting triumph, “in their own deceivings;” as if they were the chief favorites of heaven, and persons uncommonly illuminated in the grace and liberty of the gospel: when in fact they were not believers at all, and were thus boasting and exulting on the brink of destruction. So that, while they partook with Christians of the Lord’s supper, or joined in the religious feasts, in which the rich and poor ate together in a loving manner; their conduct was so shameful, that they reflected scandal on the whole company, with which they associated. For, besides their riot, luxury, and excess, “their eyes were full of adultery,” or “of an adulteress;” as if their infamous paramours had never been out of their sight; so constantly were their imaginations and inclinations engaged about their habitual wicked practices! Nay, they “could not cease from sin;” not from external constraint, or natural inability; (which would have been an extenuation of their guilt;) but from the violence of their ungoverned passions, and the strength of their long continued habits of vice; through which they were perfectly enslaved to their lusts, and indeed judicially given up to “a reprobate mind.” But, notwithstanding all their wickedness, they pleaded so speciously and confidently for their corrupt principles, and so extenuated or apologized for their crimes; that they beguiled very many professed Christians, who were not established in knowledge, faith, grace, and experience. (Note, Rom. 16:17—20.) Thus they supported the expense of their sensual gratifications, by flattering and quieting men’s consciences in the indulgence of their passions. For their hearts were exercised with covetous practices; and they constantly employed themselves in devising artful methods of obtaining money from their deluded followers, till inured to such base pursuits they felt no remorse about them; which showed them to be “the children of a curse,” and exposed to the wrath of God for their multiplied abominations. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.)

Note.—The false teachers and their disciples, who were described by the apostle, had evidently “forsaken the right way” of scriptural truth and holy obedience, and were gone astray; not merely from an erroneous judgment, but from the sensuality, ambition, and avarice of their hearts. Thus they followed the example of “Balaam, the son of Bosor,” (or Beor,) who so “loved the wages of unrighteousness,” that he endeavored, in disobedience to the injunction of JEHOVAH, to go unto Balak, and curse the people whom God had blessed. But he was rebuked for his iniquity, not by the immediate voice of God, nor by one of his prophets; but by the ass on which he rode, which, though naturally “dumb,” was miraculously enabled to speak; that by so despicable a creature God

Note.—These teachers and their disciples were like “wells,” from which men expected to draw water, but which could only disappoint their expectations: (Marg. Ref.) they were as clouds which gave hopes of fructifying rains; but, instead of yielding any advantage to others, they were themselves “carried about with” tempestuous winds. Thus the persons spoken of were driven about by their own passions and “by every wind of doctrine,” from one false opinion to another. (Note, Eph. 4:14—16.) Indeed they were given up by God to final obduracy; as “the mist,” the dimness, and dismay of darkness, or of wickedness, despair, and misery, was reserved for them as their everlasting portion.

19 While <sup>t</sup> they promise them liberty, <sup>u</sup> they themselves are the servants of corruption: for of whom a man is <sup>x</sup> overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage.

Note.—These men were not only very wicked themselves, but the cause of sin and ruin to others.—While they “spake swelling” and pompous words, which had no meaning, except as they showed the vain-glory and ostentation of their hearts; “they allured,” by their confident boasting and specious pretensions, such professed Christians as were glad to suppose, that “the lusts of the flesh, and much wantonness” or lasciviousness, could consist with the salvation of the gospel: (Notes, Num. 24:16. P. O. 14—25. 25:1—3.) Thus they drew off those, who had actually, as to their outward conduct, “escaped from those who lived in error,” that is ignorant of Christianity, or avowedly rejecting it; but who abstained from their former indulgences only from fear, while their unrenewed hearts still hankered after them, not having been made “partakers of a divine nature.” (Notes, 20—22. 1:3—5.) But whilst they paid court to the carnal minds of hypocrites, by promising them liberty from every yoke, as if the service of God had not been the most ‘perfect freedom;’ they themselves were the “slaves of corruption,” or of the most corrupt and vile inclinations: as it was a general rule, that a man must become the bond-servant of him, by whom he was vanquished and taken captive. They were evidently vanquished, taken captive, and enslaved by the devil and their own lusts; and it was impossible that they could lead their followers into any better condition. 20 For if, <sup>y</sup> after they have <sup>z</sup> escaped the pollutions of the world, <sup>a</sup> through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, <sup>b</sup> the latter end is worse with them than the beginning.

22 But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb, <sup>g</sup> The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire.

Note.—If professed Christians, having escaped the outward “pollutions of the world, by the knowledge of Christ;” (Notes, 18, 19. 1:3, 4.) were again, by the artful seduction of false teachers, entangled in those polluting practices, as if consistent with the service of Christ, and so “overcome” as habitually to indulge in their corrupt inclinations; “their latter end,” after they had learned thus to pervert the gospel, would be far worse than the beginning when they sinned in ignorance; as they must have done violence to far clearer light and fuller conviction. (Notes, Matt. 12:43—45. Luke 11:14—26. Heb. 10:26, 27.) It would therefore have “been better,” for such wretched heretics, hypocrites, or apostates, if they had “never known the way of righteousness,” and the truths, promises, and precepts of Christianity; than after all their instructions, convictions, and profession, to “turn,” in avowed disobedience, “from the holy commandment delivered unto them,” to repent of their sins, to believe in Christ, and to love and obey him: as this would leave them more deeply condemned and completely hardened. But it was not to be wondered at, that teachers of this character made proselytes; for it had “happened unto them according to the true proverb” of Solomon, (Note, Prov. 26:11.) and to another of similar import, the one of which has been explained, and the other is too obvious to need explanation.—They are the two most disgusting and loathsome emblems, which the whole animal race can suggest; and are adduced to illustrate the filthiness of those, who, after convictions, professed repentance, and outward reformation, return back to wickedness, because their carnal hearts loved it. But if the power of God should change the swine into a “sheep,” (the emblem of the regenerate,) though it might be thrown into the mire, yet it could no longer “wallow in it” with delight, but must be most uncomfortable till cleansed from it.—They who “had escaped the pollutions of the world,” had not been “made partakers of a divine nature;” nor had the nature of the dog, or swine been changed: the swine was washed, but not made “a new creature.”—The true Christian is born again, “new created to good works;” Christ dwells in him by his Spirit, and “makes all things new.” (Notes, Matt. 12:29—32. Heb. 6:4—8. 10:26—39. 1 John 2:18,19. 5:14—15.)—The difference between this chapter, and the other parts of Peter’s epistles, in the style and manner, and its coincidence with that of Jude, have made several expositors suppose, that both of them borrowed their language from some ancient book which is now lost: but of this every reader must judge for himself.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The unbelief, selfishness, and impiety of man’s carnal heart, always give an opening to “false teachers,” who “speak smooth things” “to draw away disciples after them,” for their own credit or lucre’s sake; and alas! how many thus “turn away their ears from the truth, and are turned into fables,” and liberally reward ingenious men for helping them to deceive themselves! Hence it has come to pass, both in Israel and in the Christian church, that men have arisen, who have found their account in corrupting the humbling, holy truth of God, by “privily bringing in damnable heresies;” who have denied and cast off obedience to the authority of the Lord, whilst they professed to glory in his special favor and abundant mercy; who have attempted to separate the redemption and the commandments of the Lord Jesus, and to expect pardon through his blood, whilst they yielded no obedience to his precepts! Thus they deceive themselves and others, and “bring upon themselves swift destruction.” These specious refinements, while they seem to some persons the “gospel of free grace,” in its full purity, are in fact “damnable heresies,” which finally ruin all who “follow such pernicious ways,” and also cause “the way of truth to be evil spoken of.” For many see the bad tendency and effects of these delusions; and charge them on all who preach and profess the doctrines of salvation by grace alone, in the most scriptural manner and in connexion with holy obedience. The sober teachers of practical and experimental Christianity need not be surprised, to find their hearers drawn from them by plausible and soothing preachers; for even in the primitive times, before miracles ceased, “the merchandise of souls by feigned words” brought in ample gains; whilst love of the truth and of the brethren were the pretence, but covetousness was the concealed principle of their conduct. In vain do men of this character hope to escape with impunity: the judgment so long since foretold, and “the damnation” menaced, will speedily arrive; though unbelief may suppose that the justice of God “lingereth and slumbereth,” because he “endures with much long suffering the vessels of wrath which are fitted for destruction.” (Note, Rom. 10:22, 23.)

V. 4—9.

The manifold “goodness of God,” if it do not “lead men to repentance;” and engage them to obedience, will no more secure them from condemnation, than the creating kindness of God to angels induced him to “spare” such of them as sinned in heaven itself; but “as he cast them down to hell, to be reserved in chains of darkness to the day of judgment to be punished;” so will he, in due season, execute “the vengeance that is written,” on all impenitent sinners. (Notes, Rom. 2:4—11.) The destruction of the antediluvian world, and its millions of inhabitants, and that of Sodom and Gomorrah, stand on record to confute the vain notions of those, who imagine that God is so lenient, that he will not take vengeance on his rebellious creatures. But his mercy shines forth conspicuously, in preserving Noah and his family; and in delivering him from the flood, and from that perverse generation, to which he was so long a most unsuccessful “preacher of righteousness;” but still more in rescuing Lot, and dealing with him as “a righteous man,” notwithstanding all the blemishes of his character. Yet his vexation in Sodom, and his escape from the destruction of that abandoned city, with the loss of every thing except his life, loudly warn us to keep separate, as much as possible, from ungodly connexions, if we would avoid the most heart-rending anguish, and the most painful and reiterated corrections. But, if indeed we do fear, trust, love, and obey the Lord; we should recollect in all our conflicts and trials, that “he knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation;” that he has ten thousand ways of rescuing us, of which we never thought; and that his wisdom and power will surely effect the purposes of his love, and the engagements of his truth: whilst wicked men often escape suffering here, because “they are reserved to the day of judgment to be punished,” with “the devil and his angels,” in that eternal state of hopeless misery, to which they are doomed.

V. 10—14.

Whilst we take encouragement from the tender mercies of our God, let us also stand in awe of his holiness and justice. None have more cause to tremble, than they who are emboldened to gratify their sinful passions by presuming on his grace and mercy: nor can any thing more fully illustrate the desperate wickedness of the human heart, than the abominations, in which men have wallowed, whilst professing to be religious, and while contending for the holy doctrines of Christianity! Many, both in ancient and modern times, have deemed themselves at liberty to “walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness;” and have “despised government” of all kinds: as if licentiousness and anarchy were the only desirable freedom; presumption and self-will equivalent to holy confidence and boldness in the Lord; and calumnies, or revilings, against "the powers that be," the proper way of "rendering to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's!" Such liberty of conscience, and license of speech and conduct, holy "angels, who are greater in power and might," never thought of. If we were more like them, we should be more cautious in speaking and acting; and more scrupulous not to "bring a railing accusation" against others, especially our governors; though we could not approve of either their character, or their measures.—But there have been in every age, professors of the gospel, who have acted "like natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed," and have deemed themselves authorized to "speak evil of those things, which they did not understand." And if they venture to "speak evil" of the divine law, and deem themselves freed from all obligation to obey it; can we wonder, that they should cast off every yoke, discard all subordination, wish to level all distinctions, and disdain subjection to every human authority, which must always be defective, and liable in some things, to censure? (Notes, 2 Sam. 15:1—6. P. O. 1—12. Note, 1 Kings 12:4. P. O. 1—20.) But let Christians stand at a distance from such contests: for alas! many running into these excesses, bring their characters into suspicion, and open the mouths of those who speak evil of us, as of evil-doers; nay, many "utterly perish in their own corruption."—Especially let us fear a licentious profession of the gospel: doubtless they "will receive the reward of unrighteousness, who count it pleasure to riot in the day-time." These are indeed "the spots and blemishes" of the church, who "sport themselves in their own deceivings;" who join with Christians in sacred ordinances, and with the world in their licentious and dissipated revels; and who attempt to reconcile these things, by perverting the doctrines of the gospel, and boasting of their liberty and privileges! But could it have been conceived, if scripture and facts had not evinced it, that teachers and professors of the holy doctrine of Christ, could preserve their confidence, credit, and influence, whilst "their eyes are full of adultery," and while "they cannot cease from sin?" that "unstable souls" could be beguiled by such men? and that success should attend the "covetous practices" in which their hearts are exercised? or that they should be considered as blessed, who are indeed the children of the curse, and evidently described as such in the word of God? (Ps. 10:3.)

V. 15—22.

Heresies and divisions in every age have grown out of the ambition, avarice, and licentiousness of teachers; and men have "forsaken the right way, and gone astray" after Balaam's example and from his vile principle, because they "loved the wages of unrighteousness:" but they will be "rebuked for their iniquity," and punished for "their madness," with as much contempt and severity as he was. Being "wells without water, and clouds carried about" as the wind of favor or lucre changes, it is plain, that to them "the mist and blackness of darkness is reserved for ever." Those who would escape these deceivers should consider, that they abound in "high swelling words" of vain boasting and ostentation; and speak of themselves, as if wisdom and knowledge belonged exclusively to them; at the same time that they give great indulgence to the lusts of the flesh. Thus they allure, with the hope of sensual gratification, worldly advantages, and impunity in them, such "stony-ground hearers," as under convictions and transient affections, had "escaped from those that live in error." Persons of this description, not valuing the liberty of obeying the commandments of God, are disposed to listen to those, who promise them liberty of another sort, and assure them that their practical instructors have held them in bondage: and thus antinomian tenets are embraced, as a covert way of returning to the world and sin, and as a more specious and quiet kind of apostacy. For the liberty promised by those, who are overcome by their own lusts and passions, can be no other than licentiousness: and if after men have "escaped the pollutions of the world, by the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled" in such delusions, and brought back under the dominion of their lusts; "the latter end is worse with them than the beginning;" nor is such a departure from practical Christianity to antinomian principles and behavior, less fatal, than open apostacy; as it serves to keep the conscience entirely asleep, perhaps more effectually than any other opiate yet devised by the grand deceiver of mankind. It is evident, therefore, that "it would have been better" for such men, if they had continued ignorant of the gospel; than thus to pervert it to their own deeper condemnation, and the ruin of others along with them. Yet, alas, how many are there, who thus verify "the true proverb," by "turning as the dog to his own vomit again, and as a sow that is washed to her wallowing in the mire!" But this shall never happen to any, who are "in Christ new creatures," and made partakers of a divine nature. Let us then pray continually, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right Spirit within me:" let us remember, that a "holy commandment" is given to us, as well as "exceedingly great and precious promises;" let us beware of turning from the precepts, as much as of rejecting the truths, of Christianity; and let us equally avoid antinomian corrupters, and pharisaical opposers of the gospel, as alike the enemies of "our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

CHAP. III.

The apostle reminds his brethren, of the promised coming of Christ; and predicts that scoffers will ridicule their expectation of that event; 1—4; being willingly ignorant of the truth in that respect, 5—7. He shows the reason of its being delayed, and the awful manner, circumstances, and consequences of it; with exhortations and encouragements to diligence and holiness, 8—14. He shows that "his beloved brother Paul" had taught them the same doctrine; commends his epistles; and shows how "ignorant and unstable men wrested" some parts of them, as they did "the other scriptures, to their own destruction," 15, 16; and concludes with warning the readers against seducers; and exhorting them to "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of Christ," 17, 18.

2 That <sup>e</sup> ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, <sup>f</sup> and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour:

3 Knowing this first, <sup>g</sup> that there shall come in the last days <sup>h</sup> scoffers, <sup>i</sup> walking after their own lusts,

4 And saying, <sup>k</sup> Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were <sup>l</sup> from the beginning of the creation.

Note.—"This second epistle" appears, by the opening of this chapter, to have been primarily addressed to the same churches as the former; though this is not mentioned at the beginning of it. (Preface.—Note, 1:1,2.) It was the design of the apostle, in both his epistles, not so much to instruct his brethren in truths, which they had not learned; as to stimulate and animate their "pure," sincere, and upright "minds" to practise their duty, by recalling to their remembrance the truths and precepts, which they had been taught: lest remaining sinful, temptation, forgetfulness, and the artifices of false teachers should turn them aside from it. (Notes, 1:12—15. 1 John 2:20—25. 4:1—6.) He therefore wrote to them, in order that they might be mindful "of the words," which "the holy prophets" of old had spoken, concerning the salvation and kingdom of Christ; (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) and "of the commandment," which had been given them by him, and the other "apostles of the Lord and Saviour," to prepare for his coming to judgment, with patient expectation and diligence in their several duties. Of this they needed to be admonished; as they ought to know in the first place, and as a matter of chief importance, that, under the Christian dispensation, and after some time had elapsed, (Note, 1 John 2:18,19.) there would certainly come among them a set of scornful men, endeavoring to subvert their faith, by deriding their expectation of "the coming" of Christ to judgment; and treating the great truths of the gospel with infidel contempt and profane ridicule; whilst they indulged, without restraint, the several corrupt inclinations of their own evil hearts. These persons would insolently demand, what was become of "the promise" which the Lord had left them, that he would appear a second time among them, to complete their salvation, and destroy their enemies. Had it not manifestly failed? And would they suffer themselves to be any longer imposed on, or continue to adhere to his self-denying, persecuted religion? For it could not be denied, that "since the fathers" (the primitive teachers and professors of Christianity, or the ancient patriarchs and prophets, to whom it was first revealed,) "had fallen asleep, all things had continued," in respect of the returning seasons, and all other outward dispensations, as they had been used to do "from the beginning of the world;" without any material alteration answerable to the extraordinary things, which had been spoken on that subject.

Pure. (1) Εὐκαρῆν. Sincere. Phil. 1:10. Εὐκαρῆν, 1 Cor. 5:8. (Note, Phil. 1:9—11.) —Us the apostles. (2) The apostles are here classed with the prophets, who "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, 1:20,21. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.)—Scoffers. (3) Επιλαῖται. Jude 18. Επιλαῖται, Luke 23:11.

5 For this <sup>m</sup> they willingly are ignorant of, that <sup>n</sup> by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth * standing out of the water, and in the water;

6 Whereby <sup>o</sup> the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished:

7 But <sup>p</sup> the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire, <sup>q</sup> against the day of judgment, <sup>r</sup> and perdition of ungodly men.

Note.—The scoffers, of whom the apostle wrote, (some of whom seem to have been even then endeavoring to corrupt the church,) were "willingly ignorant" of the scriptural account of the creation, and of the dealings of God with men in former ages: for they perversely withdrew their attention from such subjects, as tended to confute their self-conceited and profligate infidelity, and to confirm the doctrine of a future judgment. (Notes, Prov. 14:6. John 3:19—21. Rom. 1:28—32.) Otherwise, they would have known, from the books of Moses, that the heavens and the earth were originally created, by the omnipotent word of God; who "spake and it was done, who commanded and it stood fast;" and that the earth, especially, was formed out of the Chaos, which had been previously brought into existence for that purpose; the dry ground being, at the command of God, separated from the waters, which retired to the channels prepared for them. (Notes, Gen. 1:1—9. Job 38:8—11. Pss. 24:1,2. 104:6—9.) Thus the earth, or dry land, with its productions and inhabitants, as distinguished from the seas, "stood up out of and above the water;" but it was surrounded by the water, which was needful to moisten, and purify it, and to render it fruitful. Yet, when the wickedness of men had provoked the Lord to execute vengeance on them; this very arrangement, in itself so conducive to the welfare of mankind, became the means of their destruction: for all the parts of the globe being deeply covered with waters, by the omnipotence of God, "the world that then was perished;" all the inhabitants of the dry land, and all the works of men were entirely destroyed; nothing remained, "but Noah and they that were with him in the ark;" the external appearance of the earth was, no doubt, greatly altered; and a new race of inhabitants were raised up to people it. (Notes, Gen. 6:13,17. 7:10-24.) At the same time, the Lord promised, and covenanted, never more to destroy the earth, by a universal deluge: (Gen. 8:20-22. 9:9-17. Is. 54:6-10.) yet intimations had been given of a total dissolution, which was to terminate the present state of things; (Notes, Ps. 102:25-23. Is. 51:4-6.) and under the New Testament dispensation, it was more expressly revealed that this would be effected "by fire." It might therefore be said, that the visible heavens, and the earth with all the lower creation, were condemned to be destroyed by fire; and, by the word of God, which could not be broken, were treasured up as fuel for the general conflagration. This would certainly take place about the same time, with the great "day of judgment," which would prove "the day of perdition to ungodly men," who would then be "punished with everlasting destruction." (Notes, 10-13. 2 Thes. 1:5-10. Rev. 20:11-15.) The event was therefore certain; and the same power was engaged to effect it, which had created the world, destroyed it by the deluge, restored it to its present form, and still continued to uphold it in that state.

8 But, beloved, <sup>a</sup> be not ignorant of this one thing, <sup>b</sup> that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Whatever scoffers were "willingly ignorant of," or perversely cavilled at, as if delays were failures, or respites impunity; Christians must "not be ignorant of that one thing," which tended to clear up all the rest; namely, that the divisions of time among men bear no proportion to eternity, with which all the counsels and purposes of God are immediately connected. "Let then, this one thing not be concealed from you;" that one day, and a thousand years, are with God the same thing: for as every event comes to pass, exactly at the time which he has appointed for it; the intervention of a thousand years is no more than one day, in respect of those things, which he will most assuredly accomplish in their season.—This maxim, well considered, is the key for reconciling what is continually said, concerning the speedy approach of judgment, with the prophecies, extending through many ages, which must previously be accomplished. (Notes, Ps. 90:3-6. 2 Thes. 2:1-12. Rev. 11:1,2. 20:4-6.) 9 The Lord <sup>u</sup> is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness; <sup>x</sup> but is long-suffering to us-ward, <sup>y</sup> not willing that any should perish, <sup>z</sup> but that all should come to repentance.

Note.—It must by no means be supposed, that the Lord "is slack," or dilatory, concerning the performance of his promise; as some men (both profane unbelievers, and impatient believers,) might understand the word: (Notes, Matt. 24:45-51. Luke 18:1-8.) but, in fact, the delay of judgment was the effect of his long-suffering towards the church, and the human race. He patiently, and with much "long-suffering," endured the provocations of the wicked, and even the scornful defiance of infidels; because he would not be influenced by their crimes, to terminate the present state of things, till all who shall eventually be saved, were brought to repentance and prepared for the kingdom; as he was not willing that any of them should perish. He "delighted not in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and live;" and his long-suffering gave sinners space for repentance: and as all things were ready, and all were invited, yea, commanded to repent; in this sense, God had shown himself "unwilling that any should perish," and "willing that all should come to repentance;" though many would pervert his long-suffering to their deeper condemnation. Men's impentence arises from their unwillingness to return to God, not from his unwillingness to receive them: and therefore he is doubtless "willing that all should come to repentance" and be saved; but no one can conceive, that he absolutely willeth the salvation of the wicked, in the same sense as he willeth that of the righteous, ("I will, be thou clean,") and yet is unable to effect it! Many, who were Christians at the time when the apostle wrote, owed their salvation to "the long-suffering of God," who thus gave them time and grace for repentance: and even some of those, who were then objecting to the delay of Christ's coming, as if it invalidated the truth of the gospel, might at length be converted, and know that "God was not willing that they should perish, but that they should come to repentance."—These are two distinct, but consistent views, which may be taken of the subject: the one accords to the condition of sinners, when first taught to attend to the word of salvation; to them "the long-suffering" of God, the provisions of the gospel, the general invitations, the "command to all men to repent," and the promises that Christ will cast out none who come to him, are so many assurances, that "the Lord is not willing that any," who seek salvation, "should perish;" but that sinners of all descriptions should come to repentance; and that they who repent, do that which pleases him, and shall be accepted. (Notes, Ez. 18:23. 33:11. John 6:36-40. 1 Tim. 2:3,4. Rev. 2:20-23.) But the other refers to God: "known unto whom are all his works, from the beginning of the world;" and according to it, the established believer ascribes his willingness to repent, to special grace; and acknowledges that if he had been left to himself, he should have perished in obstinate love of sin, and enmity to God, as numbers of his fellow sinners do.—Let it be particularly noticed, that God "willeth all men to repent," exactly in the same manner, as he "willeth all men to be saved," so that none who do not repent can have any benefit from his willingness that all should be saved.

13 Nevertheless we, <sup>q</sup> according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Though delays seemed to be made, whilst the Lord waited to complete the counsels of his wisdom and mercy, and to render the implacable enmity of impenitent sinners manifest to the whole creation; yet his great and terrible day would certainly come, suddenly, when not expected, and with most surprising consternation, and inevitable destruction, to all who were found unprepared. (Marg. Ref. b. —Notes, Matt. 24:42—44. 1 Thes. 5:1—3.) At that important catastrophe, “the heavens” and all the host of them, (as far, at least, as connected with this earth and its inhabitants,) “will pass away,” and rush into confusion and destruction; with a tremendous “noise,” of which thunders, earthquakes, and all other convulsions of nature, are wholly inadequate to give the least conception. Then all “the elements,” of which the earth and its atmosphere, and all the luminaries connected with it, are composed, shall melt “with intense heat:” and not only one vast city, or one whole nation, but the earth, with all its cities, forests, mountains, yea, the contents of its bowels to the very centre, as well as all the works of men, however admired or magnificent, which cover the surface of it, shall constitute one vast conflagration, and be reduced to as confused a Chaos, as that from which it was first created; and indeed shall “wholly pass away.” (Notes, Ps. 102:23—28. Matt. 24:32—35. Heb. 1:10—12. Rev. 20:11—15.) “Seeing, therefore, all those things,” which are the objects of the senses, and the coveted, admired, or envied possessions of men, must certainly be dissolved and perish, as to their present mode of existence; “what manner of persons ought we to be, in all holy conversation and godliness,” who believe and expect these things? For it must be evident, that at the period referred to, they who had no treasure secured in heaven, nor any interest in him as a Saviour, who would then come as the Judge of the world, would be most miserable. Ought not Christians therefore to be continually “looking for,” and preparing to welcome that solemn season, called emphatically “the day of God;” “hastening” to have all ready to meet him with comfort, and even longing for the solemn catastrophe which would perfect their felicity? (Note, Luke 21:25—28.) Though it was in itself so terrible to think of, “the heavens being on fire and dissolved, and the elements melting with heat;” (Marg. Ref. c—p.) yet the gospel suggested such consolation, and inspired such hopes, that believers had no reason for terror or uneasiness: for, though all other inheritances and distinctions must then be terminated; yet they, according to the sure promise of God, “looked for” and expected “new heavens and a new earth,” another and far more glorious and blessed state of things, and an abiding habitation, into which righteous persons alone could find admission; and in which all the inhabitants would be perfected in purity, obedience, and love of each other; so that no sin could enter, to defile or disquiet them to all eternity.—In some scriptures, “new heavens and a new earth,” seem figuratively to describe the most prosperous and peaceful days of the church on earth; (Notes, Is. 65:17—19. 66:19—23. Heb. 12:26—29.) yet here the state of the righteous, after the day of judgment, and the dissolution of this present world, are evidently intended; but what is meant, in various particulars, the fulfilment alone can fully explain. (Note, Rev. 21:1—4, 22—27. 22:1—5.)

15 And <sup>u</sup> account that the long-suffering of our Lord is salvation; even as <sup>v</sup> our beloved brother Paul also, <sup>w</sup> according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you:

Note.—From the preceding considerations, the apostle took occasion to exhort his beloved brethren, who professed to believe and “look for such things,” to prove that they really did so, by diligence in every duty and ‘means of ‘grace;’ that they might be ‘found of Christ at his coming, in peace’ with God, with their own consciences, with each other, and with all men; being "without spot, and blameless." (Notes, Phil. 2:14—18. 3:8—11. 1 John 2:26—29. Jude 20,21.) For if they thus evinced themselves "partakers of Christ," by the diligent obedience of faith and love; they would certainly be then "presented faultless before" God, and as perfect in regard to sanctification, as justification. They ought also "to account the long-suffering of the Lord to be salvation." Every day, that their lives were spared, gave them the opportunity of diligently seeking "to make their calling and election sure." (Notes, 1:5—11.) Professed Christians had space afforded them, to seek a real and more influential experience of the work of divine grace; and "the goodness of God" was suited and intended to "lead sinners to repentance." All, therefore, who read the epistle ought to "account the long-suffering of the Lord to be salvation;" as they owed it to that alone, that they were not then in the place of despair and final misery, instead of the land of hope, of prayer, and forgiveness, or in the way of peace and salvation. The apostle likewise observed, that his "beloved brother Paul" also had written to them, to the same effect, "according to the wisdom, which" God had bestowed on him. The affectionate and highly respectful language, here used by St. Peter, concerning "the apostle of the Gentiles," who was supposed to differ from him in some points of doctrine, and who had openly rebuked his dissimulation at Antioch, is peculiarly worthy of observation. (Note, Gal. 2:11—16.) The fourth and fifth verses, of the second chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, are generally supposed to be intended; (Note, Rom. 2:4—6.) but it is not obvious, in what sense these could be said to be written to those, whom St. Peter addressed. They therefore, who maintain that he wrote to the Jewish converts exclusively, point out some passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews, to which they think he alluded. (Heb. 9:27,28. 10:36,37.) Yet that epistle was directly addressed to the churches in Judea, and not to the Jewish converts in Asia: so that this does not much aid their supposition. But, indeed, the apostolical epistles, though written to some particular churches, or description of Christians, were evidently intended for general instruction: and as Peter had read the epistles of Paul when he wrote this; so they, to whom he wrote, had probably done the same, even in respect of those which were addressed to other churches.—The false teachers, whom Peter opposed, seem to have grounded their "damnable heresies," (Note, 2:1—3.) on a misinterpretation of some passages in St. Paul's epistles, which might appear to some persons contrary to Peter's exhortations: so that the general tenor of the epistles to some of the Asiatic churches, or of that to the Hebrews, rather than detached expressions, seems to have been meant; for certainly, when properly understood, they are as exhortatory and practical as St. Peter's. Indeed, the apostle next observed, that this was the case in all the epistles of his beloved brother Paul; (as those to the Romans, the Corinthians, the churches of Macedonia, and to Timothy and Titus; as well as those to Ephesus, and Colosse, and the Hebrews;) for in them all, he spoke of the coming of Christ, and the preparation to be made for it, with warnings and admonitions to different descriptions of persons.

Yet in these epistles, connected with plainer subjects, were some things "hard to be understood;" namely, such as related to decrees of God, and the deep dispensations of his government; and the sovereignty of his grace in saving some, and leaving others to be hardened; (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 9:11.) for of these things doubtless Peter principally spoke. Such subjects would not be properly understood, except by those, who had come to some maturity in knowledge, grace, and experience, and who received them in humble and simple faith and love. "The unlearned and unstable," therefore, even such as were untaught in the school of Christ, or unteachable through pride, prejudice, and carnal passions, and unestablished in faith and by sanctifying grace, "wrested" or perverted them, by a forced and unnatural interpretation, inconsistent with the context and the apostle's general doctrine; and adduced them in support of their arrogant, corrupt, and licentious principles and conduct: and thus they compassed their own destruction. But this perversion of St. Paul's writings (which Peter evidently here speaks of as a part of the sacred scriptures,) must not be charged on the epistles themselves; but on those who thus perverted them, contrary to their real meaning and tendency: for they thus "wrested the other scriptures also," both the books of the Old Testament, and as many of the New Testament as were then extant, and allowed to be of Divine authority. Proud, carnal, ambitious, covetous, or licentious men could wrest some things, in any of them, to a seeming agreement with their pernicious doctrines, and so pervert them to their own destruction; in the same manner, as they made a fatal use of the mysterious subjects on which St. Paul discoursed. It was therefore proper to warn and instruct men to read them with humility and a teachable spirit; and not to perplex themselves with "hard things," till they were established in such as were more plain. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:1—3. Heb. 5:11—14.)—This, however, is no reason why either St. Paul's epistles, or any part of the other scriptures, should be laid aside, or put out of sight: for men, left to themselves, pervert every good gift of God, and the corruption of the best things becomes the worst.—"The persons, to whom Peter's epistles were written, were for the most part Paul's converts."—"Of this 'vice' (wresting the scriptures,) 'they are most commonly guilty, who, from the pride of understanding, will receive nothing but what 'they can explain. Whereas the humble and 'teachable receive the declarations of revelation, 'according to their plain, grammatical, unstrained meaning; which it is their only care 'to attain, by reading the scriptures frequently, 'and with attention.' Macknight. He should have added, 'and with constant, fervent prayer, 'for the promised teaching and guidance of the 'Holy Spirit.'

Note.—As those whom Peter addressed, had been previously instructed and frequently warned concerning these things: they ought to be upon their guard against the insinuations of deceivers, and to “beware” of the rock, on which so many had split; lest, being drawn from the simplicity of believing obedience to the Lord Jesus, through the errors and delusions of wicked men, especially of those licentious teachers whom he had before described; they should “fall from that steadfast” adherence to the truths of the gospel, that constant profession of faith, and that uniform course of consistent behavior, which they had hitherto maintained; and which constituted a “steadfastness” peculiar to mature believers, and distinguishing them from numbers of “unstable” professors of Christianity. In order to be assured, that this would never be their case, they ought to use every appointed means, with the greatest earnestness, that all holy affections might be invigorated in their hearts, that their grace might grow to more confirmed habits, and be productive of good works in greater abundance: and that they might also increase continually in a believing, spiritual, experimental, and transforming knowledge of Jesus Christ, as their Lord and Saviour. (Notes, 1:5—11.) After this important exhortation, the apostle concluded with ascribing glory to Christ, as God, without mentioning the Father: (John 5:23.) and with desiring that it might, or rejoicing that it would, be given to him, both at that time and for ever. Amen. And the remedy ‘prescribed, is not to lay aside the scriptures’ (or the parts specially meant,) ‘on account of their obscurity, as some would persuade us to do, but a concern to “grow in grace.”’ Doddridge. (Note, 14—16.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The “purest minds” of men on earth want “stirring up by way of remembrance;” that, by habitual attention to the doctrine and precepts delivered by “the holy prophets and apostles;” they may be kept steadfast in faith, fervent in love, and diligent in obedience. The only wise God our Saviour, by predicting the scoffs and contemptuous objections of infidels and profane men, in ancient and modern times, has taken care, that even their perverse opposition to the scripture should furnish an additional proof of its divine inspiration!—No wonder, that they, who “walk after their own lusts,” endeavor to deride our expectation of a future judgment, and of the eternal destruction of all those, who “will not have Christ to reign over them;” or that they catch at every thing, which can help to buoy up their chief hope of “escaping the damnation of hell.” Most of their cavils and sneers expose their ignorance of “the scriptures and of the power of God;” yet their very ignorance is the consequence of their ungodliness, and wilful opposition to those parts of divine truth, which condemn their darling iniquities. But none, who read and believe the sacred oracles, can be ignorant, that the omnipotent Creator of the heavens and the earth, who upholds, preserves, changes, or destroys his own work, as he sees good, has his whole plan before him; that “the heavens and earth, which are now, are reserved unto fire, against the day of judgment,” which will also be “the day of perdition,” to all “ungodly men;” that God alone is competent to determine about times and seasons; and that “with him one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.”

V. 9—13.

The Lord, in reality, makes no delays: however his dispensations may appear to our unbelief and scanty knowledge, he “is not slack concerning his promises;” according to men’s notions of “slackness;” but he is “slow to anger,” “he waiteth to be gracious;” he “delighteth not in the death of a sinner;” and he is “willing” that any perishing rebel “should come to repentance,” and seek his salvation.—Yet “his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure;” that “great day of the Lord shall come as a thief in the night;” even as surely as the deluge came, and equally unexpected by unbelievers. (Note, Matt. 24:36—41.)—What will then be the surprise, the terror, and anguish of proud scoffers, infidels, and all ungodly and worldly men, “when the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also and all the works that are therein shall be burnt up!” Here imagination itself is baffled; description would be vain; and we can only apply the inconceivable subject to practical purposes. (Notes, Rev. 6:15—17. 20:11—15.) “Seeing all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be, in all holy conversation and godliness?” Surely Christians should not “lay up their treasures on earth," or "set their affections on things below!" It is our chief business to prepare for this great catastrophe, by daily expecting and "hastening to" the coming of the day of God; that we may possess a triumphant hope of lifting up our heads with joy, when the heavens and the earth shall form one immense conflagration, and when no refuge will remain to the wicked from the intolerable wrath of their offended Judge, and that everlasting fire to which he will doom them: and to "look for the new heavens and the new earth," which God has promised; and to prepare for this blessed habitation, remembering that righteousness dwells there, without alloy or interruption; and no unclean person can find admission.

In the firm belief of the great and eternal realities, set before us in this chapter, let us "give diligence to be found of Christ at his coming, in peace, without spot and blameless." Let sinners "account the long-suffering of our Lord to be salvation;" "seeking him while he may be found, and calling on him while he is near;" that they may have the privilege of blessing him to eternity, for sparing them when others were cut off in their sins.—We should also avail ourselves of the apostle's caution, whilst we read the epistles of St. Paul, and other difficult parts of the holy scriptures.

Most evident it is, that untaught, unteachable, self-sufficient, "unstable," and unconverted men, "wrest many things" of this kind "to their own destruction." Yet these parts of the sacred word have a most important use, in the system of divine truth; and if men will pervert them, they do it at their peril. But let us seek to have our minds prepared for the reception of such things as are "hard to be understood," by properly digesting and reducing to practice those parts, which are most simple and intelligible, and let us take care not to give strong meat to babes who cannot digest it; as it only "belongs to those that are of full age, and who, by reason of use, have their senses exercised to discern good and evil." (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:1—3. Heb. 5:11—14. P. O.) Thus taking things in their proper order, and proceeding with humility, caution, prayer, and practice, we shall be prepared to derive benefit from the deepest and most mysterious truths, and to perceive their consistency with the rest of divine revelation. Let all then, who know and read these things, "beware, lest, being led away by the error of the wicked, they fall from their own steadfastness:" and may we all "grow" continually "in grace, and the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," and ascribe glory to him now, in full assurance of doing the same for ever. Amen.

THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF JOHN.

THIS epistle has been received, without hesitation, as written by the apostle John, in the church from the earliest ages; and the similarity of sentiment and expression, between it and his gospel, is a full confirmation that he was the writer, though his name is not prefixed to it. (Notes, Matt. 4:18—22. 10:1—4. 17:1,2. 20:20—23. 26:30—35. Mark 5:35—43, v. 37. 9:38—40. Luke 9:46—56. John 13:18—30. 19:25—27. 20:1—10. 21:18—23. Acts 3:1—11. 4:13—22. Gal. 2:6—10.)—From two expressions in the second chapter; "Because ye have known him that is from the beginning;" and "It is the last time;" several learned moderns have concluded, that it was written just before the destruction of Jerusalem, and to the Jewish converts exclusively: but it has been the more general opinion, that it was written much later than that event, and not long before the book of Revelation. (Note, Rev. 6:1,2.) The texts, on which the former opinion is grounded, do not seem to require, or even admit of that interpretation, which these learned men put upon them; (Note, 2:18,19.) and there is not the least intimation of any distinction between Jewish and Gentile converts, in the whole epistle. So that the term GENERAL or CATHOLIC strictly and properly belongs to it. For it appears, to me at least, the more probable opinion, that it was written towards the close of the apostle's life, after the death of all the other apostles: and that it was intended as a circular letter, or a general address, to all the Christian churches, which was known to come from the only surviving apostle. The authoritative yet affectionate manner, in which the writer addresses his dear children, favors this conclusion: (Note, 2:1,2.) and the heretics, or antichrists, whom he evidently intended to oppose, came forward much more openly, at this time, than at an earlier period. It is generally allowed, that they who denied the real Deity of Christ; they who explained away his proper humanity, and the reality of his sufferings and death, as an atoning sacrifice; and those who taught their followers, that believers, being "saved by grace," were not required to obey the commandments of God, were the principal Antichrists. These were branched out into a variety of sub-divisions called by different names; such as Ebionites, Cerinthians, Doctæ, or Phantasiastæ, Gnostics, Nicolaitans, &c. on which ecclesiastical writers have enlarged abundantly. The apostle, however, did not name any of them, and his language was suited to refute and expose many other heretical sentiments, both of ancient and modern times; and in that view the epistle is highly interesting to us. He expatiates also on the love of God to us, as shown in the salvation of his Son; and, again and again, most pathetically enforces on believers love to each other, as shown in its practical effects, by almost every motive imaginable. This, I suppose, has given occasion to the general opinion of his being himself of a most loving disposition, even more so than the other apostles. Our Lord, however, called him, and James his brother, Boanerges: (Note, Mark 3:13—19.) and the faithful, plain, and even sharp manner, in which he speaks of hypocrites and false teachers, sufficiently illustrates the reason for which that name was given.—He also lays down various marks and evidences, by which Christians might be distinguished, both by themselves and others, from self deceivers and hypocrites: and, while this epistle differs exceedingly, in style and manner, from those of the other apostles, it perfectly coincides with them in doctrine and practical instruction.

CHAP. I.

The apostle declares, what he had seen and heard of Christ, the Word of life; that others might have fellowship with him, and with God and Christ, and might share his joy, 1—4. He shows that those who have communion with God, and are cleansed from sin by the blood of Christ, walk in the light of holiness, 5—7; and that the faithfulness and righteousness of God are engaged for the pardon and cleansing of those who “confess their sins;” but that all who “say they have no sin,” or “have not sinned,” are deceived or deceivers, 8—10.

THAT <sup>a</sup> which was from the beginning, <sup>b</sup> which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, <sup>c</sup> and our hands have handled, of <sup>d</sup> the Word of life;

2 (For <sup>e</sup> the Life <sup>f</sup> was manifested, and we have seen it, <sup>g</sup> and bear witness, and show unto you <sup>h</sup> that eternal Life, <sup>i</sup> which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us;)

Note.—(Note, John 1:1—3.) The apostle began this epistle, in the same abrupt manner as he did his gospel, and without any particular address or salutation: and he wrote as a witness or a messenger, in a sententious declaratory style, and not in an argumentative manner.—“That which was from the beginning;” that essential Good, that uncreated and self-existent Excellency, which had been from the beginning, as co-equal and co-eternal with the Father, and had at length appeared in human nature for the salvation of sinners, was the great subject, concerning which the apostle wrote to his brethren. If we then understand him to mean Christ, as the Son of God, (and it does not appear what else could be meant,) “from the beginning;” must denote from eternity: for if the creation and time were coeval, “That which was from the beginning;” when “God created the heavens and the earth;” must have been eternal. (Notes, Gen. 1:1. Prov. 8:22—30.) Indeed the same expression, in some places may signify the first opening of the dispensation of the gospel: (2:7,8.) yet this sense does not appear at all consistent with the context in this place. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:13,14.) The obvious meaning however is this: that essential Good, which “was from the beginning with God, and was God;” “by whom all things were created;” had “become flesh” to dwell on earth among men; and the apostle and his brethren, especially the other apostles, had heard him deliver his doctrine, and publish his salvation: they had seen him with their eyes, while they “beheld his glory, as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.”

(Note, John 1:14.) They had not only viewed him with a transient glance; but had accompanied him, and contemplated him, both in respect of the wisdom and holiness of his character, the power of his miracles, and his abundant love and mercy, during some years; till they saw him expire on the cross, and afterwards risen from the dead: and “their hands had handled him;” while he descended to give them this full proof of his resurrection, that they might witness it to others. (Notes, Luke 24:36—43. John 20:19—29.) This divine Person, “the Word of life;” “the Word of God;” became incarnate, that he might be “the Life of men;” and this “great mystery of godliness” the apostle declared to mankind. (Notes, 5:11, 12,20,21. 1 Tim. 3:16.)—Indeed he wrote to assure his Christian brethren throughout the world, yea, and all future ages, of the reality of Christ’s human nature, which some in those days denied, and that of his divine nature, which his resurrection fully demonstrated.—(Note, Rom. 1:1—4.) For “the Life;” the Source and Author of life, natural, spiritual, and eternal, who possessed “life in himself;” necessarily and unchangeably, and who might therefore be called “the Life;” life being essential to him, and derived from him to all creatures; even he had been “manifested in the flesh;” to be the Life of fallen men. (Notes, John 1:4—9. 8:12. 11:20—27. 14:4—6.) And when “the Son of God;” the essential Life of all creatures, was thus manifested, the apostles were peculiarly favored, in being chosen to be his attendants, and to see him, during his ministry, at his death, after his resurrection, and at his ascension; that they might bear witness to others of these things, and show unto them “that eternal Life;” which had always subsisted with the Father, as “One with him;” and yet distinct from him, One in the undivided essence of the Godhead, but possessing distinct personality, as “the only Begotten of the Father;” by an eternal and incomprehensible generation; (Notes, John 1:14,18. 3:16.) and who “in the fulness of time” was manifested, as the Author and Giver of eternal life to sinners, through the redemption of his blood, and by the communication of his new-creating Spirit. The apostles did not, therefore, proceed on report, or insufficient proof, when they went to the nations; and encountered all hardships, dangers, and persecutions, in preaching the gospel to them. (Note, 2 Pet. 1:16—18.) But they declared the things, concerning the Person, doctrine, and salvation of Christ, which they had seen and

Note.—The apostle declared these things to his brethren, and to mankind in general, even to all who should ever read his epistle; not from selfish motives, but from the purest benevolence and love; in order that they might "have fellowship with him," and the other apostles, and share their immunities, hopes, comforts, and everlasting advantages: and whatever an ungodly world might imagine, concerning the condition of such poor, despised, and persecuted men, whom they treated as the "off-scouring of all things;" "truly their fellowship was with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ." They shared the special love and favor of God the Father; all his perfections ensured their happiness; they were made "partakers of his holiness," and even "of a divine nature;" and they had the assured hope and blessed earnestness of enjoying him, as their all-sufficient and eternal Portion. Moreover, they had a free access to him, as their Father; and, a sacred union having been formed between him and their souls, through Jesus Christ, and by the power of the Holy Spirit, a most honorable and happy communion and intercourse was continually carried on between the glorious God and them; while they poured out their inmost souls before him, made him their Hope and Confidence, aimed to do his will and manifest his glory, celebrated his praises, were his devoted worshippers, and sought their felicity in his favor and acceptance: while in return, he graciously heard their supplications, accepted their persons and services, communicated to them his holy consolations, showed them his will, supplied them with wisdom and strength suited to their wants, and took on him the care of all their concerns.—This "fellowship with the Father," arose from their "fellowship with his Son Jesus Christ." By faith, they became partakers of him and his salvation; so that, "of God he was made to them Wisdom, and Righteousness, and Sanctification, and Redemption;" and, by a continued regard to his Person, mediation, and grace, and an habitual reliance on him, as the Life and salvation of their souls, they had access to God as a Father. Thus, through the incarnate Son, and his righteousness, sacrifice, and intercession, and the communion maintained with him by faith; they had "communion with the Father" also, notwithstanding their sinfulness. (Note, John 17:1—3.) This was no enthusiastic imagination, or hypocritical pretence, as many were disposed to represent it; nor was it an unsatisfactory or inefficacious transaction, as others might suppose, who did not deny its reality: but they had the happy experience of it in their souls; manifested the excellency of it in their lives; and shared with their brethren, in this sacred communion, such comforts and substantial satisfaction, as made them ample amends for all their losses, sufferings, and hardships. Being therefore assured, that this alone was sufficient to make men happy; and knowing the inexhaustible "fulness of Christ," and his inestimable salvation: they desired exceedingly, that their fellow-sinners would come and share their felicity; and, leaving the lying vanities of the world, or the empty forms and superstitions of false religion, would seek with them this "fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ." This desire, glowing with intense ardor in the hearts of the apostles, and united with zeal for the honor of their Lord, animated them to all their self-denying labors, and reconciled them to all sufferings, in promoting the gospel. The same principle induced the apostle John, to write this epistle to the churches, that, rejecting the heretical doctrines of false teachers, "having fellowship with Christ" and with those who adhered to the apostle's doctrine, and avoiding whatever could interrupt their communion with God, their holy joy might be complete, and they might live in actual possession of those invaluable privileges, to which they were called by the gospel.—The "communion of the Holy Spirit" is not particularly mentioned, in this most interesting passage; because the communion of believers with the Father and the Son, and their loving communion with each other, are effected and maintained by the communication, and influences of the Holy Spirit; who is the immediate Author of their spiritual life, hope, love, joy, peace, and holy affections; the bond of union between Christ and his mystical body, and between every member of it and all the others; the great blessing communicated from the Father's love, and through the incarnation and mediation of the Son; and the Seal and pledge of all other blessings, in time and to eternity, and the preparation for them. As the Holy Spirit is, therefore, the great Agent in our "communion with the Father and the Son;" it was not necessary, that communion with him should be separately mentioned. r that God is Light, and in him is no darkness at all.

6 s If we say that we have t fellowship with him, and u walk in darkness, x we lie, and y do not the truth:

7 But z if we walk in the light, a as he is in the light, b we have fellowship one with another, c and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.

Note.—In order that Christians might obtain that “fulness of joy,” of which the apostle spoke; and that they might be upon their guard against all delusive appearances, and all false pretences to communion with God; it was needful for him, to state to them “the message,” or declaration, which they “had heard from” Christ himself, concerning the nature and perfections of God. (Note, John 17:25,26.) The substance of this declaration is, “That God is light,” pure, perfect intellect, an all pervading all penetrating Spirit, essential knowledge, wisdom, holiness, love, and felicity: so that “in him is no darkness at all;” no ignorance, error, moral evil, or defect in felicity; and therefore none of these can be derived from him. (Notes, Jam. 1:13—18.) As this is the nature of God, the doctrines and precepts, which come from him, must be of the same kind: true religion may be distinguished from counterfeit by this criterion; and especially his spiritual worshippers, who really have communion with him, may be known by their conformity to him. If then, any persons, professing Christianity, affirm, as a matter of experience, that “they have fellowship with God” according to the gospel, and consequently are partakers of his salvation; while at the same time, “they walk in darkness,” or are deluded by Satan, through ignorance and false doctrine, to live in the habitual practice of sin, and so to have “fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness;” such persons speak falsehood, and are either deceiving or self-deceived hypocrites, whose conduct belies their profession: for they do not practise what is sincere and faithful, and according to the truths of the word of God. But if the professed disciples of Christ “walk in the light, as he was in the Light,” acting habitually as becomes those who know God, and his holy truth and will; and imitating his purity, righteousness, goodness, and truth, in their behavior among men; they may deem this a sufficient evidence, that they are “partakers of Christ,” and interested in the love of the Father through him. (Notes, 2:7—11. Ps. 97:10—12. John 12:34—36. Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 5:8—14.) They are warranted to conclude, that “their fellowship with God,” and the intercourse maintained between him and their souls, is the very same, in nature and efficacy, with that of which the apostle spake. They are admitted to ‘the communion of the saints,’ and entitled to all the privileges and blessings belonging to them, and ought to be the objects of their special love and complacency. And they may also be fully assured, that the “blood of Christ,” the Son of God, has taken away the guilt of all their former sins, and removes that of all their daily defects, defilements, and transgressions; nay, that the Holy Spirit, as given through the merit of his atonement, is cleansing away, and will at length perfectly destroy, all the sinfulness of their fallen nature. (Marg. Ref.)—Light. (5) Notes, Ps. 36:5—9. 84:11,12. Is. 60:15—22. Rev. 21:22—27. Light is the emblem of knowledge, holiness, and happiness—darkness, of ignorance, error, wickedness, and misery. (Ps. 97:12. Is. 2:5. Notes, Mal. 4:2, 3. Acts 26:16—18. Col. 1:9—14. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.)—Do not the truth. (6) Note, John 3:19—21.

The message. (5) Παγγελια. Acts 2:39. 23:21. 2 Cor. 7:1. Heb. 4:1. It generally means promise: but message, or declaration, seems more suited to the context (3). Some copies read αγγελια. (3:11.)

8 If we d say that we have no sin, e we deceive ourselves, and f the truth is not in us.

9 If g we confess our sins, h he is faithful and i just to forgive us our sins, k and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.

10 If l we say that we have not sinned, m we make him a liar, and n his word is not in us.

Note.—While the apostle strenuously insisted on the necessity of an habitual holy walk, as the effect and evidence of the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus, and of communion with him; he guarded with as much care against self-righteous pride, as against an antinomian perversion of the gospel. If any professed Christians, while they seemed to “walk in the light,” should be so elated with a conceit of their own attainments, as to say, “that they had no sin;” but were perfectly pure, and as holy in heart and life as the law of God required; they were certainly deceived in a most awful manner: nay, “the truth was not in them,” as a principle of life and illumination; or they could never have fallen into a mistake, which implied gross ignorance of God, of his spiritual law, and of their own hearts. On the other hand, such as confessed their sins, with unreserved, ingenuous, and sincere humiliation before God, (for that alone can be here intended;) owning their guilt and desert of wrath; not attempting to extenuate or deny their offences, but casting themselves wholly on the mercy of God for pardon; would certainly find him “faithful” to his promises, and “just” to his covenant-engagements to Christ their Surety, and to them through him: yea, his very justice, (as satisfied by the atonement of his Son,) would induce him to forgive all their sins, how numerous and aggravated soever they had been; and to cleanse them, not only from the guilt, but gradually, and at length perfectly, from all the pollution of their unrighteousness. (Notes, Ps. 32:3—5. Prov. 28:13. Ez. 36:25—27. 2 Cor. 7:1.)—But if any continued to deny that they had sinned, and so implicitly to maintain, that they needed not to confess guilt, or seek forgiveness and cleansing from sin; they, in fact, “treated the words of God as a lie,” and his declaration of man’s sinfulness as a libel on human nature; nay, they virtually denied the truth of the whole gospel, which every where speaks of men as sinners; so that the word of God was not in them, by faith, or by the teaching of the Holy Spirit. (Notes, 5:9,10. Ps. 51:4. Rom. 3:3,4.)—In this latter verse the apostle opposed such persons as totally denied their sinfulness, their need of mercy, or their desert of wrath; by whatever method they deceived themselves into a confidence that they had never sinned; or that they had, in some way, made amends for their offences, or could do it, and were not justly deserving of punishment. “Have patience with me and I will pay thee all.” (Matt. 18:26.) But in the former, he showed the gross error of those who imagined, that, through the gospel, they were so perfectly sanctified, as to have no spot or blemish of sin in them: the present tense, “have no sin,” being used in the eighth verse (ἀκούων οὐκ ἔχουσιν), and the past, in the tenth, “have not sinned” (οὐκ ἤκουσιν αἰμαίνεσθαι). #### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

Our most lively gratitude is due to God for that fully authenticated revelation, which he has given us concerning “the Word of life,” by those who heard and saw him, and who had the testimony of their senses, to the reality of his incarnation, and of his resurrection. But what words can express the praises of the love of God, in causing “the Life to be manifested,” even “the eternal Life, which was with the Father,” in order that we, justly condemned rebels, who were dead in sin, might live by him! This appears the more admirable, when we consider the deep abasement, and the agonizing sufferings, to which this manifestation exposed the incarnate Word and “Son of God;” nay, how his very humiliation has given occasion to the children of men, to rob him of his glory, to deny his Deity, and to speak of him whom “all angels worship,” as if he were altogether such a one as themselves!—Faithful and zealous ministers, though they have not “seen and heard” “the Lord of glory,” with their outward senses, may yet declare to men, what they have known and experienced of his mercy, truth, and power: and as he became incarnate, that the chief of sinners, believing in Christ, “might have fellowship with him,” and share in the love of the Father through him, for their everlasting felicity; so they are willing to labor and suffer, that their fellow-criminals may be brought to “have fellowship with them,” in their most precious blessings. (Notes, 2 Cor.

5:18—21. 6:1,2.) However men may despise and revile them, and “cast out their names as evil,” or deem them madmen, bigots, enthusiasts, or hypocrites, yet verily, they possess the greatest honor, pleasure, privilege, and advantage imaginable, in “communion with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ;” and in their liberty of “access with boldness,” at all times, into the presence of the eternal God; whilst all the perfections and Persons in the Godhead are engaged, by covenant, to make them most blessed for evermore. These benefits are not like the scanty possessions of the world, which are congenial to the selfishness of our fallen nature, and excite the jealousy of every competitor; because the more partake of them, the less each person can appropriate. But the joy and felicity of “communion with God” corresponds with the enlarged philanthropy of the regenerate soul, and tends to increase it; because the good enjoyed is infinite and all sufficient; so that any multitude, however immense, may participate the joy, without its being at all diminished; nay, the felicity seems enhanced to each possessor, by its being communicated to increasing numbers. This “fellowship with the Father, and his Son Jesus Christ,” is “the secret of the Lord,” which is peculiar to those who fear him; and ungodly men must therefore treat it, as the delusion of a heated imagination. (Notes, 5:9,10. Ps. 25:14. John 14:21—24. 2 Pet. 1:19. Rev. 2:17.) No doubt there are both enthusiasts and hypocrites, who are deceived, or mean to deceive others: yet that is not worth counterfeiting, either by Satan or wicked men, which in itself is of no value or reality. There are then those, who are warranted to say, “Truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ;” and they all desire to bring others to partake of the same blessedness. Indeed it is the design of all the instructions in the word of God, to lead us to possess these consolations, that so “our joy may be completed,” and we filled “with all the fulness of God.” (Note, Eph. 3:14—19.)—For all other joy is not only unsatisfactory, but fading, withering, expiring.

V. 5—10.

It is the grand interest, as well as the duty of all men, to regard “the message” sent to us by those, who “declare that God is Light, and that in him is no darkness at all;” for as his perfect felicity is inseparable from his perfect holiness; so our happiness must be proportioned to our sanctification. By this rule we may also judge, who truly have fellowship with God, and who only make false professions of such a holy intercourse: for if any man profess this, and “walk in darkness, he is a liar, and does not the truth;” but if we habitually “walk in the light” of holy obedience, as it becomes those who have the transforming knowledge of God; “we have fellowship” with prophets and apostles, and with all saints, yea, with the Lord of saints himself; “and the blood of Jesus cleanses us from all sin.” For Christianity is, in every respect, “the religion of a sinner;” and they, who walk most nearly to God in holy conformity and obedience, are most deeply sensible, that their best days and duties are mixed with sin, and need cleansing by the atoning blood. No encouragement is therefore given in scripture to any of those, "who say they have not sinned," or that they have no longer any sin to repent of, to be pardoned, or to be cleansed away. Such men deceive themselves; yea, they "make God a liar, and his word is not in them:" they arraign the truth of his declarations, and the justice of his government; and cannot possibly offer "the sacrifice of a broken and contrite heart" before him, or properly understand the nature and value of his gospel of abounding grace. Let us then learn to plead guilty before God, and be humbly willing to know the worst of our case. Let us ingenuously confess all our sins, and all their aggravations; relying wholly on his mercy and truth through the righteousness of Christ, for a full and free forgiveness; and let us trust in him as "a just God and a Saviour;" and wait on him, "to cleanse us from all unrighteousness," till no spot or blemish remain in us, even in the judgment of our holy and merciful Father. (Notes, Eph. 5:25—27. Col. 1:21—23. Jude 22—25.)

CHAP. II.

The apostle warns his "dear children" not to sin: yet points out to them Christ, the Advocate with the Father, and the Propitiation for their sins, and the sins of the world. 1, 2. He shows that the knowledge of Christ, and union with him, must be evidenced by obeying and imitating him, and by love of the brethren; that thus "the love of God is perfected in us;" and that those are deceived, blind, and hypocritical who live in hatred and malice, 3—11. He warns believers, of every age and attainment, against "the love of the world;" showing the vanity of all that is in the world, compared with the eternal happiness of those who do the will of God, 12—17. He cautions them against many antichrists, who fatally seduce some professed Christians, 18, 19; declares that the unction of the Holy Spirit is the effectual preservative against them, 21, 22; points out to them the true doctrine of Christ; and exhorts them to adhere to his truth, and abide in him, in expectation of his coming; and to prove their regeneration by an habitual righteous conduct, 23—29.

Note.—It is probable, that John was the only surviving apostle, when he wrote this epistle: and his old age, and long continued usefulness, faithfulness, and love to Christians, must have given him a kind of parental authority, throughout the whole church, as far as it adhered to the pure gospel of Christ. It was therefore peculiarly proper for him, to address them as his spiritual family, whose welfare he had greatly at heart: and as most of them were young in years, compared with this beloved and truly venerable disciple, who probably was the oldest Christian on earth at that time; none ever could with such propriety adopt the endearing language of his Lord, and call his fellow-Christians, "My little," or my dear, "children," as he did. (John 13:33.) The diminutive is commonly used by way of endearment, and to express peculiar affection.—He was desirous of counselling, warning, and encouraging them, "as a father does his children." (Note, 1 Thes. 2:9—12.)—The things, which he had written to them in the former chapter, and what he was about to add, were intended especially to preserve them from committing sin. Every part of the doctrine of salvation by Jesus Christ, was suited to display the malignant nature and effects of sin, and the determination of God not to let it go unpunished; to teach men to hate, dread, and flee from it; and to lead them to the love of God and holiness; as well as to give the most effectual encouragement, motives, and assistance, to "repent, and do works meet for repentance." Yet, "if any man had sinned," he should remember, that "he and his brethren had an Advocate with the Father."—Superficial speculators might here have been ready to charge the apostle with inconsistency, as if the latter part of the verse had contradicted the former: but the state of a Christian, in this world, is such, that encouragements "after having sinned," are as necessary as warnings against sin: for, through the remaining power of sin in his heart, the manifold snares of the world, and the power of Satan, "he cannot always stand upright." The most valiant soldier will be most furiously attacked by the enemy, and may sometimes be foiled: and despondency is as inimical to watchfulness, diligence, and holy obedience, as even carnal security itself. No man, on scriptural principles, can conclude himself to be any better than a hypocrite, who habitually commits sin, because God is ready to forgive the penitent: but the fallen, who desire to arise and renew the combat, have abundant encouragement so to do. From the sinner's first conviction of guilt, to the end of the Christian's warfare by death, the general rule is applicable, that, "if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father;" one, who has undertaken, and is fully qualified and authorized, to plead in the presence of God the Father, in behalf of every one, who seeks for pardon, salvation, and all things pertaining to them, in his name, and in dependence on his meritorious intercession. This gracious Advocate never refuses his patronage to any one who seeks it, and he never pleads in vain. For he is "Jesus;" the Saviour, Emmanuel, the incarnate Son of God; and "Christ," the Messiah, the anointed One, chosen, appointed, commissioned, and consecrated to his office, as "an High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek." He alone is "the righteous One," who received his human nature pure from all spot of sin, and, as our Surety, perfectly obeyed the whole law of God, and so fulfilled a righteousness more valuable in itself, and more honorable to the Father, than that of all mere creatures could have been. Moreover, "He is the Propitiation for their sins:" for, through the atonement of his sacrifice on the cross, and his subsequent intercession, he rendered a holy and righteous God propitious and favorable to sinners; so that "he waiteth to be gracious" upon the true "mercy-seat," or propitiatory, of which that above the ark of the covenant was merely a type and shadow. (Note, Rom. 3:21—26.) Nor was the benefit of this propitiation to be confined to the Jewish nation, or to those who had already embraced Christianity; on the contrary, sinners all over the whole earth were admitted to share in it by believing the gospel: so that all men, in every land, and through all successive generations, ought to be invited to come to God, through this all-sufficient Atonement, and by this "new and living Way;" and all who accept this invitation are as much "partakers of Christ," and of all his blessings, as if he had become incarnate, and died upon the cross, for them alone. (Notes, 1:3,4. John 1:29. 14:4-6.) So that there was most abundant encouragement to every one, in the whole world, who heard the gospel, to repent, and seek salvation by faith in the blood of Christ; but none to any man to continue impenitent and unbelieving.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—True Christians might be "overtaken in a fault," or even fall into a grievous sin; and their infirmities and deficiencies in their daily walk would be many: yet an habitual and unreserved obedience to the commandments of God, was to be considered as the only proper evidence of a saving knowledge of Christ, and of God the Father in him. (Notes, 26-29. 3:11,12. Is. 53:11,12. John 17:1-3. 2 Cor. 4:3-6. Phil. 3:8-11. 2 Pet. 1:3,4,8,9.) The "knowledge" of God, or of Christ, evidently signifies a believing, spiritual, and experimental acquaintance with him, and a cordial acceptance of his salvation, ensuuing their participation of it. Professed Christians would desire to know, or be assured, that their faith and experience were genuine, and distinguishable from those of all hypocrites: and, as the apostle and his brethren "knew that they thus knew," or had known "Christ," not by exact notions, or transient high affections, or miraculous powers, but by a disposition of heart, habitually, unreservedly, and willingly to keep his commandments; so any other man might know his profession to be sincere, and his knowledge of Christ spiritual and saving, by the same evidence. But he who professed to be acquainted with Christ, and to believe in him, whilst he did not keep his commandments, in his habitual conduct, was a liar and a hypocrite, in whom there was no sincerity, and in whose heart the truth had no place. On the other hand, whoever he was, that remembered and observed the counsels, and obeyed the precepts of Christ, in him verily, or really, "the love of God was perfected;" the love of God to him as a chosen and redeemed sinner, had attained its end in his sanctification; and his love of God had produced its fruit, and was in a mature state, as the grafted tree is, when loaded with its intended and valued increase. (Note, Jam. 2:21-26.) By this, apostles and primitive Christians knew that they were in Christ through faith, and the communion of his Spirit, and thus alive to God through him. (Note, John 15:1-8.) Indeed, if any man professed to "abide in Christ," "he ought so to walk as Christ had walked," in an habitual course of righteousness, holiness, truth, and love; or else he could not expect to be believed by those, who knew the transforming efficacy of the saving knowledge of Christ. (Note, 2 Cor. 3:17,18.)—It is evident, that the obedience here spoken of, is the humble, sincere, unreserved, and loving obedience of a believer in Christ; which is not perfect, but attended with continual repentance, and application to his atoning blood for pardon and acceptance; as well as with a constant dependence on the Holy Spirit for grace, to enable him in any measure to perform it. (Notes, John 14:15-24. 15:9,11.) Yet, even this observance of the holy commandments of Christ, in imitation of his example, though far from real perfection, constitute a degree of holiness and excellency, of which none but true Christians have any adequate conception; and which, if universal, would render the earth in no small degree like heaven itself. (Note, Rev. 20:4-6.)—We do know, &c. (3) How astonishing is it, that when apostles so clearly speak of our knowing, that we know Christ, and are in him and in a state of acceptance and peace with God; and when they so carefully show, in what way this may be known; Christian divines should, without discrimination or hesitation, speak of assurance in terms of deep and bitter abhorrence. 'The demon of assurance.' Dr. Whitaker.—As if the word and the thing were both unscriptural and anti-scriptural. (Notes, 20-25. Heb. 6:11,12.)—In fact no man, who duly considers the difference, between eternal happiness and eternal misery; who is aware of his danger of eternal damnation, and who recollects that he may be in heaven or hell, in a day or an hour, can be quiet, without some degree of assurance, that he shall go to everlasting happiness, not to everlasting misery.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—In exhorting Christians to obey and imitate their Lord, as the proper evidence of their love to him, and to the Father who sent him, the apostle “wrote no new command” to them; but that which they had received from the beginning, and which, from the first, had been repeatedly enforced by Christ himself. Nay, in fact, it had been virtually in force from the beginning of the world; as it could not comprise more than was contained in the law, which required Israel “to love the LORD with all their hearts,” and “their neighbor as themselves,” and to “be holy as God was holy.” (Notes, 3:11—24. Ex. 20:1—17. Lev. 19:18. Deut. 6:5. 2 John 5,6.) Yet this old commandment, especially that precept which inculcated “the love of their brethren,” might be called “a new commandment,” as given to Christians. (Notes, John 13:31—35. 15:12—16.) This was true, in respect of him, their Lord and Saviour, in that he had newly shown them the immensity of his condescension, compassion, and self-denying love to sinners; and had laid them under new obligations to obey and imitate him, especially in “loving one another, as he had loved them.” The command likewise was now enforced by his mediatorial authority, to the full exercise of which he had been lately exalted. It was also “true” in them; as their situation was new, and differed widely from that of the Gentiles around them, and even from that of the people of God under the Mosaic dispensation: and as they were now united by a new bond of union, as fellow-soldiers, fellow-travellers, brethren, and co-heirs of heavenly felicity. (Notes, 1 Cor. 12:12—26. Eph. 4:1

—6.) So that the love of Christians to each other, as such, though virtually comprised in the love of their neighbors as themselves, and in some things like that of the Israelites to each other, was new in respect of its exercise, motives, rules, and obligations. This arose from the change which had taken place; as the comparative “darkness” of the preparatory dispensation was past, and the “true light” shone in full splendor: (Note, 2 Tim. 1:10.) so that Christians might be expected to be more exact in their obedience, and more full of love to one another, and to all men, than even believers had been, under the darker dispensation of the law. He, therefore, who professed to walk in “the marvellous light” of the gospel, as partaking of the special grace and mercy of God; (Notes, 1:5—7. 1 Pet. 2:9,10.) and who yet hated his brother, (either any of his fellow Christians, or his neighbors,) was evidently “in darkness even to that time:” for, though the true light shone around him, he was blinded by his pride and selfishness. Thus he continued a subject of “the prince of darkness,” the author of all malice, envy, murder, and malignity: for the illumination of the true knowledge of Christ always transformed the heart in proportion to its degree, and produced a loving disposition in all those who really partook of it. But he who “loved his brother, and habitually showed himself disposed to goodness, mercy, and forgiveness, to active, liberal, self-denying love, evidently lived and “walked in the light” of the gospel, and was influenced by the inward efficacy of the truths which he professed: and there was nothing in the general prevailing disposition of his heart, by means of which Satan could succeed, in tempting him to scandalous sins; or which was likely to prove an occasion of his throwing stumbling blocks in the way of others, to their destruction. Whereas, he who hated, or bare habitual malice, against his brother, or any man, was “still in darkness:” and as men walking in the dark know not whither they are going, nor at what they stumble; so such a person would proceed in an ignorant, uncertain, and unholy manner, not aware of the danger which beset his path, nor sensible that it led to destruction: “because the darkness” of error and sin “had blinded his eyes:” till at length he would fall into some destructive heresy, or scandalous crime, and not only ruin himself, but cause others to fall likewise. (Notes, Prov. 4:18,19. Jer. 13:15—17. John 12:34—36.)—Walketh in darkness. (11) Note, 1:5—7.

14 I have written unto you, <sup>b</sup> fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning. I have written unto you, young men, <sup>c</sup> because ye are strong, and <sup>d</sup> the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one.

Note.—The apostle had before addressed Christians in general, as “his little children,” or, his dear children; but here he spoke of such as were young in years, or newly converted; and distinguished them from those, who were further advanced in the life of faith and grace. He particularly addressed his exhortations to those “new-born babes, who had tasted that the Lord is gracious:” (Note, 1 Pet. 2:1–3.) because their sins were as certainly forgiven them, for the sake of Christ, and through faith in his name, as those of their more established and experienced brethren were; though their weakness of faith, and want of distinct and exact knowledge, might prevent them from possessing the abiding comfort of it: (Notes, Ps. 32:1,2. Luke 7:44–50. 24:44–49. Rom. 4:6–8.) and the counsel, which he was about to give them, would preserve them from many snares and sorrows, enable them to obtain the assurance of acceptance, and direct them in making a suitable return for so invaluable a benefit. He wrote also to “the fathers;” as about to give the same counsel and admonitions to those Christians who were “old disciples,” matured in knowledge and experience, and who ought to be the guides and examples to their juniors, as well as to “shine as lights in the world.” (Note, Acts 21:15,16.) These had “known him, who was from the beginning:” (Note, 1:1,2.) and their long acquaintance with Christ, and with the eternal Father in him; with all their discoveries of his glory, and experience of his love, truth, and power, should engage them to simple dependance, lively gratitude, fervent love, devoted obedience, steady confidence in God, and zeal for his honor and that of the gospel.—Moreover, he wrote to the same effect to “the young men,” who had for some time professed the gospel, and had passed through the state of childhood, but were not arrived at that maturity in grace, to which “the fathers” had attained. These he addressed and exhorted, from the consideration that “they had overcome the wicked one:” they had successfully encountered the first trials and temptations, which attended their separation from sin, and renunciation of the world; and had overcome the assaults of Satan, by giving up their secular interests, breaking off their bad habits and connexions, and “entering in at the strait gate” of true conversion. (Notes, Matt. 7:13,14. Luke 13:22–30.) As they had, therefore, thus far “conquered the wicked one;” who had tried all methods in vain, to keep them from embracing the gospel, and giving themselves up to the service of Christ: they ought to go forth in his strength, aspiring after further victories; and endeavoring to spend the vigor of their spirits, or the prime of their years, in the services to which they were called, for the honor of Christ and the benefit of the church; and not in seeking worldly advantages. But, in order to give his exhortation the greater emphasis, the apostle again addressed the different descriptions of Christians; and admonished “the little children;” as those “who had known the Father;” and had already experienced his parental compassion and love for them; for which they were called to make the due returns of filial confidence, submission, gratitude, and obedience. (Note, John 14:7–14.) The address to “the fathers” exactly coincides with that which went before. To the young men he added, that they “were strong” in faith, hope, love, and all holy affections; they were in the prime of their fitness for active service, to which the mature experience of old age might be less adapted: and as “the word of God,” which they had received when they were converted, abode in them, which appeared by their victory over the temptations of Satan; so it ought to be manifested in its effects, by their increasing fruitfulness in all good works. (Note, John 15:6–8.)—It does not appear that the clause, “have known him that is from the beginning;” has any reference to the personal knowledge of Christ as Man; but is used as the other clause, “have known the Father,” of knowing him by faith and experience. For on the earliest date assigned to the epistle, only a few aged Christians, and those principally the inhabitants of Galilee and Judea, could have personally known Jesus Christ; yet the apostle speaks of all the aged Christians whom he addressed, without any limitation.

Little children. (13) ἡαδία. 18. Matt. 18:2. John 21:5. The word is changed, but the meaning seems the same.—The wicked one. (14) ὁ τὸν πονηρὸν. 3:12. 5:19. Matt. 6:13.

17 And <sup>m</sup> the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: <sup>n</sup> but he that doeth the will of God <sup>o</sup> abideth for ever. [Prac. Ob.]

Note.—The general counsel and exhortation, which the apostle meant to enforce on all the persons above described, was this, "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world."—The world, as God created it, is very good, and a proper object of a measure of love, as his work and for his sake: but as sin has marred it, our affections ought to be wholly alienated from it. The men of the world, as distinguished from believers, are enemies of God and subjects of Satan: we are therefore required to renounce their friendship, to avoid intimate society with them, and to abhor their ungodly principles and practices; while we pity their miseries, love their persons, and try to do them good. (Note, Jam. 4:4–6.) The things of the world may be desired, possessed, and valued, for those uses and purposes, which were intended by God when he created them, and in subordination to his favor, authority, and glory; but for those purposes to which sin has perverted them, and sinners idolize them, we must not desire, seek, or value them, in any measure or manner: and if any man thus "love the world, the love of the Father is not in him;" his idol has never been dethroned, his heart remains unchanged, he is not reconciled to God through Jesus Christ, and has no true filial love of him in his heart. (Notes, Matt. 6:24. Luke 14:25–33. Gal. 1:3–5. 6:11–14.) For "all that is in the world," as thus idolized, and abused by men, who seek their happiness from it and not from God, may be summed up under three heads: First, Such things, as are suited to excite and gratify "the lust of the flesh;" or the irregular, inordinate, and polluting hankerings and cravings of the carnal heart and the animal appetites after gross sensual gratifications, as if man's happiness consisted in them. Secondly, Those things, which are suited to excite and gratify "the lust of the eyes;" or the desires of the carnal heart after the possessions, embellishments, decorations, and enjoyments, which the eye is apt to look at with coveting, and inordinate desire of obtaining: such as treasures of gold and silver, or precious stones, jewels, houses, lands, gardens, stately mansions, elegant furniture and equipages, pictures, statues, curiosities, costly garments; and in short all that wealth can purchase, which gratifies the beholder's eye, or his other senses, (as music, or perfumes,) but is not directly to be considered as gross animal indulgence. Thirdly, "The pride of life," or those titles and dignities, that authority and honor, celebrity, renown, that reputation and splendor, which form the summit of earthly exaltation, and the highest prize in the poor lottery of this present life, to which the pride and ambition of man's apostate nature can aspire; and the greatest gratification of that mental concupiscence, which is congenial to the old temptation, "Ye shall be as gods." (Note, Gen. 3:4,5.) For a poor vain-glorious worm to be advanced to such dominion over his fellows, or to possess such honor among them; as to be tempted to forget his own mortality, as well as his Creator and Judge; and to be so surrounded with vassals, attendants, and flatterers, or so emblazoned with high-sounding titles, and encumbered with magnificence, as to have nothing on earth which he can behold above him, or equal to him, and thus to disregard him that is "higher than the highest:" this is the perfection of "the pride of life." And all pre-eminence and distinction above others partakes of the same nature, whether power, splendor, or renown, on any account, be the immediate source of it. All these things, (to which every earthly object, which any man is tempted to put in competition with the will, favor, and glory of God, must be referred,) are "not of the Father:" this idolatrous desire of created things, did not attach to them, or to man, as God made them and him; they do not consist with his prescribed use of them; they are not bestowed for these purposes; nor do the men, who are his children and influenced by his grace, desire, seek, or use them in this manner. But "they are of the world," as "lying under the wicked one:" these desires after created things, and this use of them, are the effects of man's apostacy and subjection to Satan; they are thus made the baits, by which men are seduced into sin, and kept in rebellion against God, and the incentives to all their vile passions. (Note and P. O. Matt. 4:8–11.) They suit the taste, and form the supreme good, of worldly men, and are their only portion; and for the sake of them the whole earth is filled with violence, fraud, crimes, and misery. (Notes, Ex. 20:3. Rom. 8:5–9.) But "the world passeth away, and the lust of it;" all its pleasures, treasures, honors, and splendor will soon vanish for ever; (Note, 1 Pet. 1:23–25.) one generation after another of those who have coveted, possessed, and gloried in them, vanishes, and passes away into an eternal world: (Notes, Luke 16:19–26.) those who lust for them, and idolize them, will be eternally disappointed and miserable. But the man, "who doeth the will of God," as revealed to sinners by the gospel, will abide for ever in the possession and enjoyment of that substantial good, which he has been enabled to make choice of. (Notes, Matt. 7:21–23. Luke 10:38–42. 11:27,28.)—It is evident, that the apostle did not speak of the lawful, moderate, subordinate, and holy use, possession, or desire of God's good creatures, for the ends to which he has appointed them; but of the unlawful, inordinate, unholy, and idolatrous hankering after them, and valuation of them, to which in one form or other all men are totally addicted, so long as they remain in an unregenerate state.—Many vain efforts have been made, by limitations, distinctions, and exceptions, to evade the force of this passage; and some have written on it, as if they meant to show, how far we might safely be carnally minded, "and lovers of the world:" but, in the apostle's evident meaning, we are no more allowed to love the world at all, than we are to worship Dagon; for we cannot "serve God and Mammon;" or love the Lord, and "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life." A man may carry on any business, fill any station, or possess any wealth, as the servant and steward of God, according to his commandments, for his glory, and for the good of mankind; and he may desire food and raiment and things suitable to his rank in life, and use them with thankfulness, temperance, and humility: but he cannot love or desire them, to gratify his sensuality, pride, avarice, or ambition, or seek his happiness in them, without being an idolater. Every regenerate man is delivered from the dominion and allowed indulgence of "the love of the world;" and strives and prays against the remains of it, as it rises in his heart, or breaks forth into his life: he desires to love God perfectly, and seek all his happiness from him alone: and to love all other things in him, for his sake, and as his bounty; and to use them in submission to his precepts and providence. In proportion as men get this victory over the world, the reality of their grace is evidenced, and they are prepared for laboring and suffering in the cause of Christ: but unless it is begun in the heart, a man "has no root in himself," and he will either fall away in time of temptation, or remain a mere unfruitful professor of Christianity. (Notes, 5:4,5. Matt. 13: 18—33. Rom. 12:2.)

18 <sup>p</sup> Little children, <sup>q</sup> it is the last time: and as <sup>r</sup> ye have heard that <sup>s</sup> antichrist shall come, even now are there many antichrists; <sup>t</sup> whereby we know that it is the last time.

19 They <sup>u</sup> went out from us, but they were not of us: <sup>x</sup> for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us; but they went out, that <sup>y</sup> they might be made manifest that they were not all of us.

Note.—The love of the world, as unsubdued in professed Christians, gave Satan his greatest advantage, not only in tempting them to open apostacy, but also in seducing them by destructive heresies; through which they were enabled to reconcile a quiet conscience with a carnal mind, and the indulgence of their favorite passion, under the mask of a religious profession. (Notes, Matt. 7:15—20. Acts 5:1—11. 8:18—24. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) So that the transition was natural, from warning Christians against the love of the "world," to putting them upon their guard against false teachers. The apostle, therefore, showed his beloved children, especially such of them as were young and inexperienced; that it was "the last time," or the last dispensation which God intended to introduce on earth, under which he would establish the kingdom of his Son, on the ruins of the usurped dominion of Satan; and this kingdom of Christ should continue, "till all enemies were put under his feet." But they had all heard, both from the predictions of ancient prophets, and from those of Christ and his apostles, that under this dispensation Antichrist should arise. For Satan would not only oppose the gospel by exciting persecutions, but also by corruptions of the faith; and, especially by one great enemy to the Person, truth, authority, and glory of Christ, he would obtain immense power and influence in the visible church. (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:3—12.) As St. Paul had declared that this "mystery of iniquity did already work;" so John observed that "there were many antichrists," or opposers of the pure gospel of the Lord Jesus; whose character, principles, intentions, and machinations, were of the same stamp as those of the great antichrist would be, and who were evidently his forerunners. By this they might "know that it was the last time;" and that while God was specially exerting his power, by means of faithful ministers, to honor his Son; the devil and his servants were peculiarly active in endeavoring to defeat the beneficent design. (Notes, 1 Tim. 4:1—5. 2 Tim. 3:1—9. 4:1—5.) These antichrists did not arise from among such, as had before been avowed unbelievers; but they were professed Christians, who separated from the church, and became leaders of heretical sects, contrary to the doctrine of the apostles, and derogatory to the honor of Christ. "They went out from" the disciples, having been admitted to outward fellowship with them; but they had not "been of them," as regenerated persons, and living members of the body of Christ: for if this had been the case, they "would have continued with them;" as the Lord would not have "sent them a strong delusion," but would "have put his fear into their hearts, that they should not depart from him," according to the engagement of his everlasting covenant to all true believers. (Notes, 5:16—18. Jer. 32:39—41. John 10:26—31. Rom. 8:28—39. 2 Thes. 2:3—14. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) As, however, they had not "received the love of the truth," along "with the knowledge of it;" (Note, Heb. 10:26,27.) they had been left to the pride and lusts of their hearts, and to the artifices of Satan, to be deceived into fatal heresies, and to separate from the churches of Christ; that it might evidently appear, that those who professed the gospel were not all true disciples. Thus the church was purified; and true Christians were approved, and rendered more watchful and humble; whilst the distinction between them and hypocrites was more strongly marked. (Notes, Matt. 3:11, 12. John 15:2—8. 1 Cor. 11:17—22.)—Some explain "the last time," to mean the last age of the Jewish church: but, probably, that had been subverted some years, when St. John wrote this epistle. The deceivers, predicted by our Lord, (Note, Matt. 24:23—25.) were men who falsely professed to be the promised Messiah, or to point him out to others: they had never constituted a part of the Christian church, and had not therefore apostatized; they were "false Christs" and "false apostles," not Antichrists.—Indeed it is very unreasonable to interpret Antichrist, in the singular, to mean the same as the "many antichrists" afterwards mentioned; and then to confine the whole, either to the Jewish opposers or Judaizing corrupters of Christianity, as some do, or to the Gnostics, as divided into different sects, as others do. "Antichrist" signifies, one that opposes Christ, whether he oppose the doctrine of his deity, or his humanity; or whether he set himself against him, in respect of his priestly office, by substituting other methods of atoning for sin, and finding acceptance with God; his kingly office, by claiming authority to enact laws, in his church, contrary to his laws, or to dispense with his commandments; or his prophetical office, by claiming authority to add to, alter, or take away from the revelation which he has given in his holy word.—"They oppose the person of Christ, or his doctrine, or both together." Beza. In this view, there were at an early period of the church, "many antichrists;" and the heads of any sect of heretics might be, in a subordinate sense, so called, but the direct and avowed opposers of Christianity could not be meant in this place. "They went not out from them."—The term is used in this epistle, and in St. John's second epistle, and in no other part of scripture, not even in the Revelation: so that, all the controversies concerning "ΑΝΤΙΧΡΙΣΤ," as predicted by Daniel, and by St. John in the Revelation, are merely disputes about a word and do not at all pertain to the main subject. (Notes, Dan. 7: 8: 11: Rev. 13: 14:) The "antichrists," mentioned in these verses, evidently were persons, who had already appeared; but one distinguished Antichrist was yet to be expected.—"They went out from us," that is, "they went out from the apostles in Judea." Whilby. "But they were not of us:" this must mean, that they were not of us, the apostles. It does not, however, appear that they even professed to be apostles; nor does it appear, that they had previously been teachers in the church. And can it possibly be imagined, that all, either the "false Christs," or "the Antichrists," spoken of by our Lord, and by John, had been personally joined in communion with the apostles, while they continued in Judea?

Antichrist. (18) Αντιχριστος. 22. 4:3. 2 John 7. (Notes, 20—25. 4:1—3.)—From us. (19) Εξ ημων. The same preposition is afterwards rendered "of us." They belonged to us, in one sense, as the unfruitful branches to the Vine; but not in another: "they were not all clean." (Notes, Matt. 22:11—14. 25:1—13. John 13:6—11. 15:3—5.) But they professed Christianity, and had been admitted to communion with true Christians; yet their subsequent apostacy proved that, like Judas, they had from the first been hypocrites. (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. John 6:66—71.)—They would no doubt have continued.] Μεμενηκεισαν αυ. They had indeed continued. The words do not readily admit of a strictly literal translation. No doubt, added by the translators, shows how they understood them.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle wrote to his fellow Christians, to caution, comfort, and establish them; though his observations were also calculated to put all, who professed the gospel, on self-examination, and to preserve new converts from self-deception. They, however, whom he peculiarly addressed, had "an unction from the Holy One;" they were anointed by the Spirit, as sent forth, through Christ "the Holy One of God," to illuminate, sanctify, and consecrate them, to be a spiritual priesthood unto the Father. (Notes, Ps. 45:6—8. Is. 59:20, 21. 61:1—3. 2 Cor. 1:21, 22. Heb. 1:8, 9.) By his teaching and influences they "knew all things," relating to the grand doctrines of Christianity, in a spiritual and experimental manner; so that no "antichrist" could fatally delude them. (Note, 5:16—18.) He had not therefore written to them, "because they did not know the truth;" for if he had addressed persons of that description, it would have been requisite for him to discuss his subject more copiously: but he had written to them, because they "did know the truth," and that no lie belonged to it, or could consist with it. This general self-evident proposition was not more certain, than the particular application of it to the delusions of the seducers; whose false doctrines could not proceed from the same source with the truth of God. For "who was a liar," but the man, who denied that Jesus "was the Christ?" Some of these heresiarchs denied the Deity of Christ; others explained away his incarnation, and so denied his humanity, and the reality of his sufferings; and some opposed his kingly authority. Thus, whilst they retained the name of Christians, they virtually denied his Person, as "the Christ, the Son of God," and "the Son of man; Emmanuel, God with us;" (Notes, Is. 7:14. Matt. 1:22, 23.) or his offices, as the anointed Prophet, Priest, and King of his church: they denied that "God was manifested in the flesh," to "ransom the church with his own blood;" (Notes, Acts 20:28. 1 Tim. 3:16.) that in virtue of his one oblation, he might appear in the presence of God, as our great High Priest, and reign over his redeemed people, as his willing subjects, to the end of the world, and for ever. Now, whether they denied his divine or his human nature, his atonement or his authority; they virtually denied him to be the Christ; as they who had "the unction of the Holy Spirit" would readily perceive. Such a teacher was, therefore, in fact "an antichrist," who "denied both the Father and the Son;" seeing the Father can only be known, approached, worshipped, and glorified by sinners, in and through his incarnate Son; and they who "honor not the Son, honor not the Father that sent him." (Notes, Matt. 11:25—27. John 5:20—23.) The denial of the Son is, therefore, a denial of the Father: and the Supreme Being, the supposed Deity, which ancient or modern deniers of the personal or mediatorial honor of the Son, have professed to worship, is in fact the creature of their own imagination, and not the wise, just, holy, merciful, and faithful "God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." He, therefore, who "denies the Son, has not the Father," as his God, his Friend, and his Portion; but he, who, in true faith, "acknowledges the Son, hath the Father, also."—This last clause is printed in Italics, because it is wanting in most copies of the Greek Testament: yet it is found in several manuscripts; so that Beza and many other able critics look on it as genuine.—As these things were so, the apostle exhorted his beloved children, to let "that abide in them," and sink deep into their hearts, which they had heard from the beginning of their profession of the gospel, concerning the Person and salvation of Christ; for if the doctrine, which they had at first heard from the apostles and evangelists, remained in them, practically and efficaciously; they also would continue in union and fellowship with the Son, and with the Father through him. (Notes, 3—6. 1:3,4. John 15:1—8. 17:22,23.) They ought also to remember, for their encouragement, and confirmation against the artifices of false teachers, that the promise, which God had irreversibly given to all true believers, engaged to them eternal life and felicity, and all things pertaining to it. (Notes, 5:11—13. John 5:24—27. 11:20—27. Rom. 5:20,21. 6:21—23. Tit. 1:1—4.)

An unction. (20) Χρῖσμα, 27. Χρῖσι, to anoint, whence Χρῖστος. All true Christians partake of the Spirit of sanctification, not all of the miraculous powers of the Holy Spirit.—From the Holy One. Ἄπο τοῦ Ἁγίου. Mark 1:24. Acts 3:14. Rev. 3:7.—The Lord Jesus seems especially intended; for through and by him the Holy Spirit is given to us. (Note, Rev. 22:1.)—No lie is, &c. (21) Ἦαν ψευδὸς ἔσῃ. 'Lie, here means a doctrine contrary to 'that taught by the apostles; which being the 'true doctrine, its contrary must be false, or a 'lie.' Macknight.—Antichrist. (22) Ὁ ἀντιχρῖστος. The article being used, "the antichrist" is doubtless a more exact translation: but the apostle was speaking, not so much prophetically, as of the time in which he wrote.—

The character described was "the antichrist" of his own age.—Abide. (24) Μενετω. The same verb is rendered also remain and continue.

26 These things have I written unto you concerning them that seduce you.

27 But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you: but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in him.

28 And now, little children, abide in him; that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming.

29 If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteousness is born of him.

Note.—These admonitions the apostle wrote to his beloved children concerning those false teachers, who attempted to seduce them; and who had prevailed with many, that had once appeared as belonging to their company. He meant to caution and fortify them against the specious insinuations of deceivers: but in respect of real believers, "the anointing," which they had received of Christ, abode in them, as an incorruptible principle of life, and light, and spiritual discernment: so that they needed not that any man should teach them, except "as that same anointing taught them," and by "stirring up their pure minds in the way of remembrance;" or by confirming them in it, or enabling them to distinguish it, from all counterfeits: for by this teaching of God himself they were instructed in all things essential to salvation, and could not be fatally deluded. (Notes, Is. 54:11—14. Jer. 31:31—34. John 6:41—46. 1 Thes. 4:9—12. Rev. 3:18,19.) Now this teaching was altogether "truth, and no lie;" they could not, therefore, change the doctrine, which they had thus received from apostles and evangelists, under the teaching of the holy Spirit, for any new doctrine, without deviating from the truth into falsehood. This the deceivers aimed at; whereas, the apostle only sought to establish them in the truth, which had been "preached to them, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven;" and, indeed, those who had thus been taught, would "abide in him," or in it; in Christ or in the truth of his gospel. He therefore needed only to exhort them, with all parental affection, "to abide in him," or in Christ: for the apostle's mind, being full of warm affections towards his beloved Lord, spoke frequently of him, by a pronoun without an antecedent, and so without naming him. (Note, John 20:11—17.)—Let them then adhere steadfastly to the truth of the gospel; live in a constant dependence on Christ by faith for every thing; attend diligently on his ordinances, and yield a loving simple obedience to his commandments. Thus, they might be assured, that when he should "appear to judge the world;" they would not be ashamed, as all hypocrites and apostates would be; but would "have confidence before him," as his approved servants, at this his second coming, and midst all the solemn and important events of that decisive season. (Notes, Is. 28:16. 45:15—17, 23—25. Dan. 12:2,3. Rom. 5:3—5.) In this, the apostle joined himself; intimating, that he took the same method of preparing for the coming of his Lord and Judge, which he recommended to them; and that their "abiding in Christ" would then increase his confidence and joy. (Note, Phil. 2:14—18.)—As Christians could not but know, that Jesus, their Lord and Saviour, was righteous; (Note, 1,2.) so they might be assured, that all, who habitually practised righteousness, as what they loved and delighted in, "were born of him," by the regeneration of his Spirit, and were the children of God and the heirs of heaven. So that, "abiding in Christ, and bringing forth much fruit" by working righteousness, was the proper method of preparing to meet him in judgment with confidence and joy. (Note, 3:18—24.)—The expression, "born of him," which is here most obviously interpreted of Christ, concerning whom the apostle was speaking, and thus becoming "the sons of God," (3:1.) clearly shows what John believed concerning his Lord; and also, that the same individual act is ascribed to God, (5:1.) to Christ (29), and to the Holy Spirit. (John 3:5. Notes, Ps. 22:30,31. Is. 8:18. 9:6, 7. 53:9,10. Heb. 2:10—13.)—The quakers, and some others, have inferred, from the language of the twenty-seventh verse, that a stated ministry is not necessary in the church; as true believers, being "anointed by the Spirit," need not such teaching: 'but it may be of moment to observe, that the Christian ministry 'was in the highest repute in the church, when 'the gifts of the Spirit were poured down upon 'it in the greatest abundance.' Doddridge.—The papists, on the other hand, adhering to the outward form, and the opus operatum, (in which they have too many followers, among nominal protestants,) ground their chrism or anointing with oil, upon it, which is applied in several ways: but is only an appointed shadow of the true "unction from the holy One;" yet alas, it is too plain, that numbers seizing on this shadow, come short of the substance.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The gospel, when well understood and duly received, sets the heart against all sin, and effectually prevents the allowed practice of it; at the same time, that it gives the most blessed relief to the wounded consciences of those who have sinned, by the hope of pardon, through our "Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous," and his all-sufficient propitiation. Thus the divine original of the scriptures is evinced, by the complete suitableness of the remedy, proposed in them, to the actual state of men in this evil world: while all other schemes are founded on false principles; and therefore are totally inapplicable to the case, and cannot effectually bring peace to the conscience, and lead the heart to abhor all iniquity.—While we seek for grace, to make a holy use of the intercession and atonement of our heavenly Advocate, and encourage our fellow Christians to do the same; we should remember, that "He is the propitiation, not for our sins only, but for those of the whole world;" and therefore, if any sinner, in any part of the earth, be willing to accept of this salvation, he will surely be made partaker of it: and we should desire and endeavor, by all the scriptural means in our power, to be the instruments of bringing others to share with us in so precious a benefit: and of sending the gospel to all nations.—But we should carefully guard against every sentiment, which tends to pervert the abundant provision of the gospel for the forgiveness of our sins, into an encouragement to disobedience: "Hereby we know that we know Christ, if we keep his commandments;" and "he is a liar, and the truth is not in him," who professes to know him, and does not habitually obey him. What then shall we say to the unguarded language of some persons, who have argued, or asserted, that sanctification is not the proper ground of assurance, and the evidence of our justification; and that it is legal or self-righteous, for men to look to their works, as the proof of their being true believers? We can only say, that they directly contradict the apostle, and that therefore they are most certainly mistaken. "Whoso, then, keepeth the word of Christ, in him verily is the love of God perfected." By this apostles knew that they were in Christ, and by the same means we must know it of ourselves also, if we would not deceive ourselves. He, therefore, "that saith he abideth in Christ, ought himself so to walk, even as he walked;" and no competent judge will believe his assertion, if his spirit and conduct habitually be contrary to those of his Lord; for at last he, who has most closely copied Christ's example, will be found to be the best Christian, and to have best demonstrated his faith to be living, and his love sincere.

The things above spoken are "no new commandments" or declarations, but the same which all the disciples of Christ have heard from the beginning; though some affect to treat them as novelties, even as others do the peculiar doctrines of a gratuitous salvation. But Christianity, instead of rendering "the love of God" and men, and good works, superfluous and unnecessary, furnishes us with new motives, and lays us under further obligations to abound in them; and it gives us new directions concerning the love of our neighbors, by requiring love to our brethren for Christ's sake, and to our enemies after the example of his love to us. These things are true and important, according to his conduct towards his redeemed people, and their peculiar privileges and obligations, "because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth;" and we must remember, that hatred of the brethren or of neighbors, and the prevalence of any malignant passion, is proportionably a proof that a man is still in darkness. The degree of our holy love is the proper criterion and standard of our illumination; as well as the best preservative from sin, and the most active principle of obedience. He who "loveth his brother" most fervently, with a pure heart, abides in the clearest light, and will be best kept from stumbling, or from occasioning the falls of others; but he, who is of a violent, selfish, and malicious temper, however he may boast of his knowledge, walks in darkness, and is in the road to destruction; though he be not at all aware whither he is going, because "the darkness" and the prince of darkness, "have blinded his eyes." (Note, Matt. 6:22,23.) These things demand our closest attention, and most serious self-examination; and should lead us earnestly to pray, that God would show us what we are, and whither we are going.

V. 12—17.

When there is real "faith that worketh by love," even "little children" and weak believers may be assured, that "their sins are forgiven them" for the sake of Christ: and though there are different degrees of growth, strength, knowledge, and grace, among "the sons and daughters of the Lord almighty" and some of them have obtained more victories over the wicked one, or are more fit for active service, or to give wise counsel, than others are: yet they are all alike dear to their heavenly Father. They all have some "knowledge of him," and love to him; and, through "his word abiding in them," he will lead forth the young ones of his family to the same victories, and train them up to a measure of the same vigor, and maturity, to which others have already attained. But all, who would share these blessings, must be careful "not to love the world," or any of its polluting vanities. This idolatry, remaining unsubdued in the hearts of many professors of the gospel, occasions their apostacy or total unfruitfulness: and, through some remains of it, numbers are kept from comfort and assurance; their spiritual life continues low and feeble; they are mere babes, or dwarfs, to the end of their days, and enter eternity before they obtain any comfortable satisfaction, what their eternal state will be! (Note, Heb. 4:1,2.) Indeed, "all that is in the world," as apostate, and so the kingdom of the devil, is diametrically opposite to the holiness, spirituality, temperance, humility, and lowliness of Christianity: its pleasures, interests, pomps, and honors, can only excite and strengthen the propensities of our fallen nature; which it is our great business and interest to subdue and crucify. The pursuit, acquisition, or enjoyment of them, tends only to pollution and condemnation; they are soon "passing away," to be possessed no more, and he who has nothing more enduring will ere long want a drop of water to cool his tongue, and be unable to procure it; whilst the portion of him "who doeth the will of God shall be for ever." (P. O. Luke 16:19—26.)—Yet are these vanities so alluring to the remains of corruption in our hearts, that without constant watching and prayer, we cannot escape or obtain victory over the world, and him who is "the god" and prince of it.

V. 18—25.

Those who have been delivered from that original and universal idolatry, "the love of the world, and the things in the world;" will be less liable to be deceived by the seductions of those "many antichrists," who, in every age and place, endeavor to corrupt the gospel, and to oppose the honor and cause of Christ. Many thus go out from the society of Christians, but they never were true believers; for if they had belonged to that blessed company, "they would no doubt have continued with them:" nay, in fact, "damnable heresies" as much try the faith of nominal Christians, as furious persecutions do. "The unction from the Holy One" alone can teach that knowledge, which will surely preserve a man from all delusions: and when we are thus established in the great truths of the gospel; we shall know "that no lie is of the truth;" and shall therefore disregard the eloquence, learning, ingenuity, and confidence, of those who contradict the Bible; and be satisfied with opposing the express testimony of the truth itself, to their well varnished and ably defended falsehoods. We shall in this manner most clearly perceive, that every man is an antichrist, who denies the Person, or any of the offices of Christ; and that in denying the Son, he denies the Father also, and has no part in his favor, while he rejects his great salvation. Candor and liberality of sentiment are good words; bigotry, fanaticism, and a contracted mind, sound very harsh: but let us not aspire to the reputation of liberality, or desire to escape reproach, more than the apostles did. While we judge favorably of all, who trust in Christ as a divine Saviour, and obey his word; let us pity and pray for those deluded men, who deny the Deity and atonement of Christ, and the work of his new-creating Spirit; protest against their antichristian doctrine, and refuse all needless intercourse with them. (Note, 2 John 7—11.) Let that abide in all, who have professed the gospel, or would be deemed Christians, which was taught to the primitive disciples; that they may "continue in the Son and in the Father," and that the blessed promise of eternal life may belong to them also.

V. 26—29.

The subjects above treated on, are peculiarly needful at this day, concerning "those who seduce" the professed disciples of the Saviour, and would persuade them, that it is of no consequence what they believe, concerning his Person or doctrine. This fashionable species of infidelity directly contradicts the whole word of God, and in fact does its utmost to antiquate the Bible, as an useless book, in this age of wisdom and illumination.—We should desire to teach no man any thing, except what the Holy Spirit has taught us in his word, to which our appeal must be made: and "the same Spirit teaches all those," who partake of his sacred anointing, the grand truths of the sacred word, though they be left to differ in less essential matters. May we then ask and receive from Christ more and more of "his anointing," to "abide in us," and to illuminate our minds in the truth, unmixed with error; that we may abide in it, even as they did, who of old adhered to the doctrine of the holy apostles: and let all, who profess the truth, and appear to have come to Christ, abide in him; without listening to the suggestions of any modern illuminators of mankind: that when our Judge "shall appear," we may all, with prophets and apostles, "have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming." Yet let us be equally careful not to "hold the truth in unrighteousness;" but remember that they only "are born of God," who bear his holy image, and walk before him in his most righteous ways. But what numbers have been baptized, who do not thus practise righteousness, nay, who are grossly workers of iniquity.

CHAP. III.

The apostle breaks out in admiration of the love of God, in making us his children, and giving us present privileges with the hope of an inconceivable felicity; and shows that all who have this hope "purify themselves as he is pure," 1-3. He shows how the children of God, and the children of the devil may be distinguished, 4-10. He exhorts his readers to "love one another," contrasting this love with the example of Cain, and warning them to expect the hatred of the world, 11-13. He points out "the love of the brethren," as the distinguishing evidence of conversion; explains the nature and effects of it, contrasting it with enmity and selfishness; and enforces the practice of it, by the example of Christ, 14-17. He exhorts his readers to love "in deed and in truth;" and shows that confidence in God is connected with the consciousness of upright obedience, 18-24.

BEHOLD, <sup>a</sup> what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, <sup>b</sup> that we should be called the sons of God! therefore <sup>c</sup> the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not.

Note.—(Note, John 1:10-13.) The apostle, having declared, that "they who do righteousness are born of God," (2:29.) here breaks out into a joyful and admiring view of the love of the eternal Father, in having bestowed on them the unspeakable honor and felicity of being "called his sons," or children. What manner of love was this! By what words could it be described? Whether his majesty, purity, and justice, or their guilt, meanness, pollution, and misery, were considered; whether the blessing conferred on them, or the method in which it was bestowed, were contemplated; the "love of the Father" in it must be adored, as passing knowledge and comprehension. (Notes, 4:9-12. John 3:16. Rom. 5:6-10.) Indeed "the world" of ungodly men, among whom "the children of God" lived, commonly in poverty, affliction, and contempt, would not acknowledge their claim, approve their character, or desire their privileges: but this was the effect of their ignorance of God, and contemptuous alienation from his holy excellence; so that, when "the only begotten Son of the Father full of grace and truth," appeared on earth, "they knew him not," but rejected, despised, and crucified him. (Notes, John 16:1-3. 17:25,26.) But, whatever the world thought of true believers; even in their afflicted condition on earth, they were the children of God, regenerate, adopted into his family, the special objects of his love, and the heirs of his kingdom: and, how many or heavy soever their trials were, their almighty Father would surely protect, provide for, comfort, and bless them. (Note, Rom. 8:14-17.) It did not indeed "then appear," what, or how glorious, they would at length be: nor could even the beloved apostle frame an adequate conception of heaven, and its ineffable felicities; for this would be ennobling and rapturous beyond all his thoughts. (Note, 1 Cor. 13:8-12.)—Yet, believers knew in general, that "when He," even Christ, or God in human nature, should be manifested, his believing people would be made completely like him, both in the incorruptibility of their bodies, and the perfect holiness of their souls. (Note, Phil. 3:20,21.) For in the beatific vision, the eyes of the children of God shall "behold his glory in the Person of Christ," and their souls shall know his fullness and excellency, by immediate perception. This full view of "him, as he is," will complete the renewal of the divine image upon them, and for ever exclude all unholy affections; and thus they will be prepared for the consummate, unalloyed, and most felicitating enjoyment of God, in and through Jesus Christ, of which we can gain the most remote idea. (Note, 2 Cor. 3:17,18. 4:5,6.) But, wherever the regenerating Spirit of God had produced this genuine hope in a man's heart, it would certainly induce him to desire and follow after holiness, as the preparation for this final happiness, and the anticipation of it: (Notes, 1 Pet. 1:3-9.) for he, who "hoped," or trusted, "in God," that he would render him perfectly happy, by fully renewing him to the holy image of the divine Saviour, would also be fully convinced that his present comfort must bear proportion to his sanctification: the assurance, that his labor in following after holiness would not be in vain, would also give energy to his endeavors. Nor would he ever rest satisfied with his attainments, so long as any sin remained in him: but he would use all means, and wait on God for the performance of his promises; till all his affections and powers were fully sanctified, all sinful passions destroyed, all holy dispositions perfected, and all his words and actions made conformable to those of his beloved Lord. As this can never be fully attained in the present life; the true Christian's diligence, in "purifying himself as Christ is pure," must be continued till death. (Notes, 2 Cor. 6:14-18. 7:1.) Then the soul will be admitted into his presence, and perfected in his likeness: but the complete conformity of the Christian to his Lord, in body and soul, will not be possessed till the general resurrection.—He does not say "has purified," but "purifieth," that we may understand him to signify, following after holiness, not the perfect attainment of it.' Beza. (Note, 2 Cor. 7:1.)

6 Whosoever <sup>s</sup> abideth in him, sinneth not: <sup>t</sup> whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither known him.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—According to what had before been observed, they, who did not "follow after holiness," could not possess genuine hope in Christ, and in God through him, according to the gospel: but the apostle further remarked, that he who "committed," or practised, "sin, transgressed also the law," or violated and directly opposed the authority and requirements of the moral law; for the ceremonial law cannot here be intended. Thus it was taken for granted, that the holy law of God was the rule of conduct to all his true servants; and that none of them, wilfully and habitually, did any thing contrary to it. For sin is "the transgression of the law," or a lawless conduct. Whatever in any degree exceeds, comes short of, or deviates from the law, and in thought, word, or deed, is not perfectly coincident with it, is sin, a violation of the law, and deserves death according to the covenant of works: but an habitual commission of sin tends to the destruction of the law and its authority, and can never be allowed of by any disciple of Christ. (Note, Jam. 2: 8—13.) For they know, that "he was manifested" in human nature, to take away the sins of his people, by atoning for their guilt, and by renewing them to his own holy image. (Notes, 7—10. John 1:29.) Moreover, "in him was no sin;" and the perfection of his holiness, and active obedience, both magnified the precept of the law, constituted him a proper Person to be a Sacrifice for sin, and was intended as an example to his people. Whoever, therefore, "abides in Christ," as one with him, and as maintaining communion with him, does not thus sin. and "whosoever sinneth," wilfully and habitually, has never seen the glory of Christ by faith, or had any experimental saving knowledge of him; for if he had, he would be transformed, in a measure, into the holy image of him, in whom "there was no sin."

10 In this <sup>f</sup> the children of God are manifested, <sup>g</sup> and the children of the devil: <sup>h</sup> whosoever doeth not righteousness, <sup>i</sup> is not of God, <sup>k</sup> neither he that loveth not his brother.

Note.—St. John here warned his beloved children, as the other apostles had before done; (Notes, 1 Cor. 6:9—11. Gal. 6:6—10. Eph. 5:5—7. Jam. 1:22—25. 2 Pet. 1:3,9.) not to let any man deceive them by plausible pretences, into an opinion that they might live in habitual sin and yet be true Christians. For he, who "practised righteousness," as his business and delight was a righteous man; and his conformity to Christ, (being "righteous as he was righteous,") was the proper evidence of his interest, by faith, in the obedience and propitiation of the divine Saviour. On the other hand, he who "committed sin," in his habitual conduct, was evidently of the devil's party, family, and disposition; as Satan was the first sinner, and had practised rebellion and iniquity "from the beginning," and had no pleasure in any thing else. But it must be impossible to imitate and adhere to the devil, and at the same time to be a disciple of Christ; seeing "the Son of God was manifested," for the single and express purpose of "destroying," abolishing, or undoing "the works of the devil," in behalf of all his people. (Notes, Gen. 3:14, 15. Matt. 12:27—30. Mark 1:23—28. Heb. 2:14,15.)—He came to deliver them from that condemnation and slavery, into which the influence and temptation of Satan had reduced them and all mankind; and to restore them to the favor, image, and service of God. This was done, by atoning for their sins and pardoning them, and by "a new creation" of their souls to holiness: but while men lived habitually in pride, impiety, injustice, fraud, cruelty, malice, intemperance, or licentiousness, or in the neglect of a sober, righteous, and godly life; it could not be supposed, that "the works of the devil" had been destroyed, or his fortifications in their hearts cast down, by the power of Christ. Consequently the end of his incarnation and humiliation had not been in any degree answered in respect of them; and therefore they could not be warranted to account themselves his disciples. For all, who belonged to Christ, had been "born of God;" (Notes, 2:26—29. John 1:10—13, 3:1—8.) and no one who was regenerate, lived in the commission of any allowed sin: because "the incorruptible seed" of the word of God, being made to grow and live in his heart by the Holy Spirit, (Note, 1 Pet. 1:23—25.) remained in him, and rendered it impossible that he could sin with allowance, continuance, and satisfaction; even as a fish cannot live out of water, because it is out of its element, and can only languish and die unless it be again put into it.—This must be all that the apostle's general words can mean: because, if strictly taken, so as to mean, that the regenerate could not sin in any instance, (Notes, 4—6. 5:16—18. Rom. 6:1, 2. Gal. 5:16—18.) they would not only prove, that some men are perfect, but that all regenerate persons are incapable of sinning any more for ever; an inference, which no man, who either reads the Bible, or the history of mankind, will ever admit. (Note, 1:8—10.) General declarations of this kind, must always be explained, according to the argument of the sacred writer: otherwise, an antinomian may prove, that "God justifies" those who are in every sense "ungodly," and who never do good works of any kind, or for any purpose, as long as they live: (Rom. 4:4, 5.) and a man who runs into the other extreme may prove, that all the children of God are perfectly sinless, and that no regenerate person can possibly fall into any sin. But scripture must be explained by itself, and soberly; and the context evidently shows, that the apostle spoke of an allowed practice of some habitual sin: this he declared to be impossible to the regenerate, and a full proof of a man's being "the child of the devil." For in this especially "the children of God, and the children of the devil," were manifestly distinguished from one another: and he who did not "practise righteousness was not of God;" whatever his creed, profession, gifts, or experience might be: nay, this was to be carried to so great a strictness, that he who did not "love his brother," but showed a selfish, envious, and malignant spirit in his general conduct, was not to be accounted a child of God, but of the devil.—He that committeth sin is of the devil. (8) Note, John 8:41—47. 'It is 'not he, who committeth one or more sins of 'infirmity; for so did Christ's disciples while 'they were with him; nor he who committeth 'one great sin, through the power of a strong

'temptation, of which he bitterly repents, and 'from which he returns to his obedience; for 'thus did David and St. Peter, who yet were 'not then the children of the devil: but they 'who comply with the lusts of Satan, and will 'do them. The other interpretations of these 'words, including the preceding verses, seem 'either vain and impertinent, or false and dangerous.' Whitby.—Discordant ways of obviating the difficulty arising from attempting to establish the strictest literal meaning of the apostle's words, all being evidently unscriptural, serve to show, that this was not intended.—1. The regenerate ought not to sin. Ought then others to sin? 2. When the regenerate sin, they cease to be "children of God." Yet apostles say, "In many things we offend all" (Note, 1:8—10.) 3. They cannot sin, as their 'sins are not imputed to them.' This deserves no answer.—'He that is born of God proposeth 'to himself a life as free from sin as possible, nor 'does he ever of his own accord employ himself 'in sin: if at any time, contrary to the purpose 'of his mind, he has offended, he does not persist 'in the same; but, acknowledging his fault, he 'speedily returns to his former plan of life, as 'soon and as much as he can.' Gataker.—As "doing righteousness" means, not a single action, but habitual obedience to God; "committing sin," cannot properly signify merely a single act of sin, but habitual disobedience, in some particular at least.—The word rendered "sinneth not," in this connexion, must signify the same, as those translated "committeth not sin," and be explained by them.—"Doing righteousness," evidences that a man is righteous; that is, a justified believer: but the apostle does not say, that it constitutes his righteousness; nor could he say this consistently with the tenor of the sacred scriptures. "He that doeth righteousness is born of God;" it is the evidence and effect, and not the cause of his regeneration. (Notes, 2:26—29. 5:1—3.)

Note.—(Note, 1:5—7.) “The message,” which had been delivered “from the beginning” to Christians, in the name of their Lord, had especially required them to “love one another,” as the distinguishing evidence of being his disciples. (Notes, 2:7—11. John 13:31—35. 15:12—16.) They, therefore, who were manifestly destitute of this grace, ought not to be considered as true Christians; but should be ranked with Cain, who, being a professed worshipper of God, showed himself to belong to the family of “that wicked one,” the devil, by envying, hating, and murdering his brother Abel. (Notes, Gen. 4:1—15. P. O. Notes, Matt. 23:34—36. Heb. 11:4. Jude 11—13.) But for what cause did he commit this atrocious murder? What provocation had he received? What injury had been done him? None at all: but he hated the holy image of God in Abel, and the example of his humility, faith, and piety: he envied him, and was angry even with God, for accepting his brother’s oblation in preference to his; and so he was enraged to that degree, that he slew him, “because his own works were evil, and his brother’s righteous.”

15 Whosoever <sup>z</sup> hateth his brother is a murderer: and ye know that no murderer <sup>a</sup> hath eternal life abiding in him.

Note.—The disposition of Cain naturally belonged to “the children of the devil;” some of whom had despised, hated, and crucified Christ for the same reason. Christians therefore ought not to wonder, “if the world hated them;” seeing the men of the world were in subjection to “the wicked one,” and under his influence, as the children of his family. (Notes, John 7:9—10. 8:41—47. 15:17—21.) Indeed no Christian, who was well acquainted with the heart of man, could wonder at any effects of the contempt and enmity of ungodly people against “the children of God:” for it was the most unequivocal proof, that they themselves had passed “from death unto life,” from that state of condemnation and spiritual death, in which they all once lay, into a state of life, and acceptance with God; when they were conscious that they “loved the brethren.” (Note, John 5:24—27.) Humble, disinterested, active, liberal, and forgiving love of men in general, for the Lord’s sake, is indeed a good evidence of regeneration: but it is manifest that the apostle spoke here especially of the love of believers towards their brethren in Christ, as such. “By nature the children of wrath even as others,” they were disposed to hate, deride, revile, and injure those, who professed the truths of the gospel, bore the image of Christ, and were spiritual worshippers and servants of God through him: they had once perhaps been ready to deem them unsocial, precise, and troublesome enthusiasts or hypocrites, and to shun and dislike them as such. But, being “born of God,” and having thus “passed from death unto life,” they were made congenial with them in judgment and disposition; and thus they were brought to love, esteem, and honor them; to sympathize with them, and show them kindness; and to take pleasure in them, as the excellent of the earth. (Notes, Ps. 16:2,3. 119:57—63.) This affection for them was not entertained, on account of their belonging to the same party, or holding the same notions: but because it appeared to them, that they loved Christ, bore his image, and were devoted to his service. Thus “they had purified their souls, in obeying the truth, through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love of the brethren.” (Note, 1 Pet. 1:22.) But, on the other hand, every one even of those who appeared to be Christians, who did not “love his brother” with cordial affection, and indeed every one of his neighbors with good will, “abode still in death,” condemned, and unregenerate. “For whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer;” that is, he has the heart of a murderer: and the pride, selfishness, envy, and malice, which habitually rule in it, constitute “the root of bitterness,” from which murder naturally springs; so that, if all restraints were removed, and suitable temptations interposed, the act of murder would infallibly be the consequence. And they “knew, that no murderer had eternal life abiding in him;” that is, no one, who had habitually the heart of a murderer, and a disposition to perpetrate that crime, could be a regenerate person, or a “partaker of the Spirit of Christ.” No doubt David, when in one dreadful instance he was guilty of complicated murder, had “eternal life abiding in him;” (Note, 2 Sam. 11:14—17.) nor is there any single sin, into which it is impossible for a regenerate man to fall. But the apostle was showing, that no true believer could live in habitual sin: and he stated, that he who loved not his brother did in effect hate him; and he, who habitually hated his brother, was constantly of the temper of a murderer; that is, he bore the image, and was of the disposition, of the devil, and therefore was one of his children, and not one of the children of a God of love.—What an awful view do the concluding words give of the state of those numbers, who habitually determine, by duelling, to attempt the commission of murder, whenever an occasion seems to call for it!—“The apostle does not say, that by loving our brethren, we ‘are translated from death to life; ... but that ‘we may ‘know that we have passed.’” Beza. It is the evidence and effect, and not the cause. The state of death in sin and condemnation, in which all men are by nature, is here taken for granted, as an undeniable fact: (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:19—15. Eph. 2:1—3.) and also, that those who are “born of God” have “eternal life abiding in them,” and may “know that they are passed from death unto life.” (Note, 2:3—6.) The true Christian, as such, is the brother, and the object of special affection to all believers:

but men in general are our brethren, in Adam. So that hatred of any man, a brother by nature, proves the professed Christian unregenerate; but love of Christians especially, is, in this respect, the most indisputable proof of regeneration. (Notes, Matt. 25:34—46. P. O. 31—46.)

16 Hereby <sup>b</sup> perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us: <sup>c</sup> and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.

17 But <sup>d</sup> whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, <sup>e</sup> and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, <sup>f</sup> how dwelleth the love of God in him?

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The effects of genuine love toward the brethren required to be ascertained; and this might be understood, by considering "the love of God" to sinners. The reality and immensity of his love was perceived, especially, in that he, Christ, as Emmanuel, "laid down his life" for his people, to atone for their sins and ransom their souls. (Note, 4:9—12.) Many copies read "love," and not "the love of God;" so that the same weight cannot be laid upon this passage, as on a similar one. (Note, Acts 20:28.)—If however, this love of Emmanuel to lost sinners was duly considered, it must appear, that Christians were required, according to the perfection of their rule and example, to "lay down their lives for the brethren," when the case was urgent, and a proportionable good might be done by it; and therefore all inferior things ought surely to be given up for their benefit, whenever circumstances called for it. If then, a man "hath this world's good," and possesses what is sufficient for his own necessary expenses, and has any thing to spare for indulgence, or to hoard; and "seeth his brother have need," through sickness, calamity, or distress; yet, instead of cheerfully supplying his wants from his own plenty, "shuts up his bowels" from him, and stifles his compassionate feelings, through reluctance to be at the expense or self-denial of adequately relieving him, and so leaves him in want and misery; how can it be thought that the love of God abides in that man's heart? By what can it be known, that he has a true sense of the love of Christ for perishing sinners, when "he laid down his life for them?" or that the love of God has ever been planted in his heart by the Holy Spirit? seeing that the love of the world and of its goods, overcomes and chokes the risings of compassion to his suffering brother. (Note, 2:15—17.) Every instance and degree of this selfishness must weaken the evidence of a man's conversion: and when it is habitual and allowed, it must decide that he does not belong to God, but resembles Cain far more than Jesus Christ; seeing he would rather leave the children of God to suffer or die, than part with his money, or abridge his own indulgences, to alleviate their sorrows, or save their lives. This might also be deemed constructive murder; as such a man refused to preserve life, when it was in his power, and when it was his bounden duty to do it: and if the Lord had acted thus towards sinners and enemies, we must all have perished. (Notes, Prov. 24:11,12. Rom. 14: 13—18. 1 Cor. 8:7—13.)—As no higher expression of love is mentioned, than a willingness to "lay down our lives for our brethren;" it is manifest that the apostle did not maintain the extravagant notion, that true grace will make us willing to be eternally miserable, for the glory of God and the good of the universe!

24 And <sup>u</sup> he that keepeth his commandments, <sup>v</sup> dwelleth in him, and he in him. And hereby <sup>y</sup> we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us.

Note.—From the preceding considerations, the apostle earnestly admonished his “dear children,” to love one another, and their poor brethren and neighbors, “not in word, neither in tongue,” or merely in profession, and with kind and obliging language; “but in deed and in truth,” showing the sincerity and strength of their affection for them, by their actions, and in self-denying liberal communication to the supply of their wants. If they did this from faith in Christ, and love to him, they would “thereby know, that they were of the truth.” (Note, Jam. 2:14—18.) These “fruits of the Spirit” would show that they held the truth in love, and experienced the power of it in their hearts: and so they would be able “to assure their hearts before God,” in humble confidence of his acceptance; and enlarged expectations of having all their wants supplied, from the riches of his liberality. (Notes, 2 Cor. 9:8—11, Phil. 4:14—20.) But they could not have this warranted assurance of his love, if they allowed themselves in known sin, or in the neglect of known duty: for if their own hearts and consciences should condemn them of secret wickedness, or of selfish disregard to the distresses of their brethren; they could not but know, “that God was greater than their hearts, and knew all things;” and the consideration of his perfect knowledge of all their sins, his holy hatred of them, his impartial justice and almighty power, must fill them with fears of his vengeance, and prevent their confidence in him. For if they could not but decide against themselves, when made judges in their own cause, notwithstanding their partial self-love, defective views of the odiousness of their sins, and their proneness to forget them and their aggravations; how could they hope to stand in judgment before the infinite God? (Note, Rom. 2:12—16.)—According to the law, and the covenant of works, every man’s heart must “condemn him,” in proportion as he knows the rule of duty, and examines himself by it. Even according to the gospel, his own heart must condemn of hypocrisy every man, who lives in allowed, habitual sin: unless his conscience be seared, and God have given him up to be judicially blinded and hardened. Nay, when true believers are betrayed into any known sin, of omission or commission, they are arraigned at the tribunal of their own hearts, and condemned for it: and their confidence in God is weakened; till deep humiliation, and faith in the atoning blood for pardon, make way for the renewal of their peace, and the revival of their confidence: and if, through more grievous declensions, their consciences lose this salutary, though painful sensibility; severe corrections will surely be employed, as the merciful means of preventing their total ruin. (Notes, 2 Sam. 11:27, Ps. 32:3—5.)—But, if the hearts of Christians do not condemn them of any allowed or unrepented sin, or neglect of duty; then have they confidence towards God, through “the Spirit of adoption,” and by faith in their great High Priest: and thus coming to “the throne of grace;” they may ask what they will of their reconciled Father, and shall certainly receive it, if good for them. (Notes, 5:14,15, Ps. 37:4.) For their conduct evidences the reality of their repentance and faith; as they uprightly keep his commandments, and habitually “do those things that are pleasing in his sight.” He has especially, in the gospel, commanded sinners to believe in his Son Jesus Christ, and to come to him, pleading his name and merits; that they may thus receive forgiveness of sins, and all the blessings of salvation; and that, for Christ’s sake and after his example, they should love one another, in a forgiving, compassionate, liberal, and self-denying manner, even as Christ had given them commandment. He, therefore, who uprightly obeys these commandments, and others connected with them, is thus proved to “dwell in Christ, his Ark, Refuge, and Rest, and in the Father through him.” (Notes, 4:13—17, 5:20, 21, Ps. 90:1,2, 91:1,2, John 6:52—58, 15:3—5, 17:20,21, Rom. 8:1,2.) It is also manifest, that Christ dwells in him, as the Lord of his affections, and as exercising his power, and displaying his glory, in and by him: and it is known, that this mystical union subsists between Christ and their souls, “by the Spirit which he hath given them.” (Notes, John 14:15—24, Gal. 2:17—21, Eph. 3:14—19.)—This could not relate exclusively to the miraculous operations of the Holy Spirit, which were no full proof of this gracious in-dwelling; (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23, 1 Cor. 13:1—3.) but to his new-creating energy, producing holy love, and renewing the image of Christ on the soul, and “witnessing with our spirits that we are the children of God.” (Notes, Rom. 8:5—17.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

We can never sufficiently admire the love, which “the Father hath bestowed upon us,” or rejoice enough in our own felicity, if indeed we are numbered among “the children of God.” Who and what are we, or what had we done, that the infinite Lord should condescend thus to notice and distinguish us! “What manner of love is this,” that he should so redeem, regenerate, adopt, and bless such worthless worms, such guilty polluted rebels! Doubtless it is vast beyond conception, and incapable of being illustrated by any comparison. May we then be “followers of him as his dear children;” and thus show our sense of his unspeakable mercy, and express that obedient, grateful, and humble mind, which becomes those, who are so highly favored and distinguished. Should the world disown us, and deride our pretensions of being “the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty;” or even treat us with the utmost contempt, enmity, and cruelty: we may recollect “that the world by wisdom knew not God:” and that even his professed worshippers knew not “the Brightness of his glory, the express Image of his Person;" nay they crucified him "whom all angels worship!" But as they could not exclude "the First-born" from his inheritance; so neither will they be able to prevent the eternal felicity of those, whom he graciously owns as his brethren. (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 25:34—40. John 20:11—17. Heb. 2:10—13.) Even in our lowest estate, and under our heaviest trials, "we are the children of God," if we indeed believe in Jesus Christ; and we shall experience such consolations, and possess such hopes, as will support us under our transient sorrows: but none on earth can conceive, in an adequate manner, the nature of "that exceeding and eternal weight of glory," into which we shall speedily enter. (Note, 2 Cor. 4:13—18.) It "doth not indeed yet appear what we shall be;" but enough is known to animate us to the conflict: for what more can the believer desire, than to behold his beloved Saviour "as he is," in all his inexpressible glory; to be perfected in his image, filled with his love, and enabled to praise and serve him, in a manner worthy of his infinite excellency, and his own immense obligations? But let none suppose that they possess "this hope in him," if they do not now desire, pursue, and practise holiness: for every man, without exception, in whose heart this hope is planted by the Holy Spirit, "purifieth himself," in dependence on the grace, and in contemplation of the glory, of Christ, unto increasing conformity to his perfect purity. This distinguishes the living hope of God's children, from the presumption of all kinds of hypocrites. The Redeemer did not "magnify the law and make it honorable," that his disciples might violate and despise it; but that they might be delivered from its righteous condemnation, and taught to obey and delight in its most holy and reasonable precepts. As "in him is no sin," so none who abide in him allow themselves in any transgression of the divine law: for "he, who committeth sin," has not seen or known Christ, and is miserably deluded if he thinks he has.

V. 7—10.

In the vast concern of eternal happiness or misery, how careful should we be not to deceive ourselves! and the argument of the apostle in these verses, points out a way, in which many, it is to be feared, are self-deceived: for, however we interpret some expressions, they must prove, beyond all reasonable doubt, that they only are "righteous before God," as justified believers, who are taught and inclined and enabled, by "the renewal of the Holy Spirit," to practise universal righteousness, in the general tenor of their conduct; and, that a man's conformity to the example of Christ, is the only adequate evidence of his being interested in his redemption. It should also be observed, that all who are not, as "regenerate," "the children of God," are "the children of the devil:" they copy the example "of him who sinneth from the beginning," and no doubt they will be heirs of his inheritance, if they die unchanged. (Note, Matt. 25:41—46.) For "the Son of God was manifested to destroy the works of the devil;" so that they, in whose hearts the works of the devil are not destroyed, in any evident degree; but who still continue proud, selfish, sensual, malicious, envious, and alienated from the life of piety, purity, and righteousness, cannot have received the special benefit of his incarnation. "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin:" nay, he cannot do it; for his new nature, the divine "seed, remaineth in him," and effectually hinders him: even unallowed deficiencies, or such transgressions as he may be sometimes betrayed into, give him the most poignant distress. It is indeed impossible, that he can live in known sin, or take any pleasure in such a course; because it is impossible to destroy the principle of divine life, and sensibility of conscience, which has been communicated by the regenerating Spirit; or to turn "the heart of flesh" again into an unfeeling "stone." (Notes, Ez. 11:17—20. 36:25—27.) "In this the children of God are manifested, and the children of the devil:" and "whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God." May all professors of the gospel lay these truths to heart, and examine themselves by them: and let all ministers be sure, as they will answer it before the Lord Jesus, at the day of judgment, to insist fully on these topics, and make them plain to their hearers. For numbers are most certainly "deceived by vain words;" "sin on, that grace may abound;" make the lamented fact, of a believer's liability to be overcome by temptation, a palliation of their habitual wickedness; and hope for heaven, whilst living in the secret, nay, perhaps the open commission of those things, "for which the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobedience." (Note, Eph. 5:5—7.)

V. 11—17.

In ascertaining our state and character, as well as in inquiring after our duty, it behoves us to advert especially to "the message," delivered to Christians "from the beginning, to love one another." For the children of God, are distinguished by humble, harmless, and self-denying love; as those of the devil are, by proud, selfish, and mischievous hatred: or disregard to the welfare of others, except as connected with their own comfort or enjoyment. The former love all men, and desire the happiness of the very persons, whose crimes they detest, and whose society they shun; though "the household of faith" attracts their special affection, and are the objects of their cordial estimation and complacency. But "the children of the wicked one," while "they live in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another," (Note, Tit. 3:3.) above all, despise, revile, envy, detest, and persecute those, who bear the image, profess the truth, worship the name, love the cause, and seek the glory of Christ. For they are "like Cain, who was of that wicked one, and slew his brother; because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous." Whilst we remember, that the same nature belongs to "all the children of disobedience," and the same spirit works within them, (Note, Eph. 2:1,2.) which prompted Cain to murder Abel, and the Jews to crucify the Holy Jesus; we cannot "marvel if the world hate us;" nor ought we to be disconcerted by any insults or injuries with which we meet. If indeed we "love the brethren;" we may know, that we have passed from our natural state of enmity and spiritual death and condemnation; and are brought into the company of those, who are "alive to God through Jesus Christ our Lord." But if this radical grace be wholly wanting, the most plausible professor of the gospel "abideth in death:" yea, he is a murderer in his heart, he bears the image of Satan, and "hateth not eternal life abiding in him." Nor is it enough for us to avoid direct malice and revenge: our love of the brethren, of our neighbors, and even of our enemies, must be positive and active, like that of our God and Saviour, who laid down his life for those, whom he loved when enemies, in order that he might make them his friends and brethren. (Note, John 15:12—16.) If then, it may, in some cases, be our duty to lay down our lives for our brethren; surely we are bound continually to labor, expend, and deny ourselves, in various ways, to alleviate their sorrows, and promote their good; as circumstances may require, and opportunities are given us, even though our temporal provision be slender. What then shall we say to those persons, professing the gospel of Christ, who are rich in this world; and either hoard the greatest part of their wealth, or spend it in gratifying "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, or the pride of life," (Note, 2:15—17.) whilst they behold their poor brethren in distress, and refuse to pity them, or to part with any due proportion of their abundance, for their relief? How can it be thought that "the love of God dwelleth in them?" How can they help dreading "judgment without mercy, who have shown no mercy?" (Notes, Luke 6:37,38. Jam. 2:8—18.) Or how can "they suppose themselves followers of Christ," when "this world's good" is more valued by them, than his example, commandment, glory, and favor, or the comfort and even lives of their brethren? (Notes, Luke 16:19—31. 2 Cor. 8:6—9.)

V. 18—24.

All Christians, whether rich or poor, should be careful to love one another, "not in word and in tongue, but in deed and in truth; leaving cheap and hollow compliments to the children of the wicked one;" as the necessary varnish and polishing of selfishness. Thus, in proportion as grace expands our hearts in love, and the fruits of it abound in our conduct, "we shall know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before God:" and there can be no reasonable doubt, that Christians would in general be far more satisfied of their acceptance, and enjoy more abundant consolation, if they were more diligent, self-denying, and liberal, in administering to the relief and comfort of their brethren. But when "our hearts condemn us," of acting contrary to our duty, and inconsistently with our profession; the consideration of the greatness, holiness, and omniscience of God must weaken our confidence, and give us apprehensions of being dealt with after our own measure of penuriousness and severity: while the Spirit of God, being grieved by our selfishness, will leave us disconsolate and full of darkness and terror. Thus we feel, when called by the hour or season to approach the throne of grace, as children, who being conscious of having acted contrary to the will of their parents, are ashamed and afraid to meet them; seek excuses for shunning them; or appear dejected in their presence, as afraid of rebukes, frowns, and corrections, and not expecting endearments and caresses. Hence much interruption and neglect of prayer; to our unspeakable detriment! But when our hearts do not condemn us, of allowed deviations from our duty; then, like children who are conscious of having done aright, and, being assured of their loving parents' approbation, rejoice in their approach, we have confidence with God; and "whatsoever we ask we receive of him," because we show that we repent and believe, by "keeping his commandments, and doing those things, which are well-pleasing in his sight." Thus a gratuitous salvation, and the holy obedience of love, are inseparably connected; as the substance of the command of God to sinners "is faith in his Son Jesus Christ, and love to one another" for his sake. This obedience, though utterly insufficient for our justification, (for "we are made the righteousness of God in Christ,") proves that "we dwell in him and he in us;" the sanctifying Spirit, which he has given us, forms and maintains the sacred union, and "seals us the children of God;" and his consolations are the foretastes of our eternal felicity.

CHAP. IV.

The apostle warns Christians against those who falsely professed to be inspired; and gives directions for distinguishing the Spirit of truth from that of error, 1—6. He exhorts them to "love one another," from the example of God in giving his Son for sinners; and from various considerations, tending to show the necessity, benefit, and efficacy of this sacred affection, 7—21.

BELOVED, <sup>a</sup> believe not every spirit, but <sup>b</sup> try the spirits whether they are of God; because <sup>c</sup> many false prophets are gone out into the world.

2 Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: <sup>d</sup> Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is <sup>e</sup> come in the flesh, is of God.

3 And <sup>f</sup> every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God: <sup>g</sup> and this is that spirit of antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it should come; and even now already is it in the world.

Note.—Even while the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit were vouchsafed to the church, as well as his sanctifying and comforting influences; it was peculiarly incumbent on Christians to be upon their guard against "false prophets;" and important for them to be able accurately to distinguish between deceivers, and those who "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." The apostle, therefore, exhorted his brethren, "not to believe every spirit;" or every man who professed to speak by a supernatural impulse, and to be under the guidance of the Spirit of God; but to make trial of all such pretensions, whether they who made them were of God, or not. (Note, 1 Thes. 5:16—22.) This was absolutely necessary; because "many false prophets were gone forth into the world;" who were instigated and prompted by Satan, to propagate destructive heresies, in opposition to the doctrine and glory of Christ. (Notes, Matt. 24:23—25. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) In giving this direction, the apostle did not make his appeal to the miracles wrought by the true prophets. (Note, Deut. 13:1—5. 2 Thes. 2:8—12.) But he deemed it more decisive, to determine the matter by the agreement or disagreement of their doctrine with that which the apostles had from the first “preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven.” (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) For this was confirmed by the scriptures of the Old Testament; by all the miracles of Christ, and all the prophecies fulfilled in him; by his resurrection, and the accomplishment of his engagements and predictions; and by all the miracles performed by the first preachers and professors of Christianity, during a number of years: and nothing done by those false prophets, who opposed their doctrine, could pretend to equal this multiplied demonstration.—This shows, that Christians who are well acquainted with the scriptures, may, in humble dependence on divine teaching, know for themselves, who it is that preaches according to the doctrine of the apostles, and who contradicts it; and that they are bound to make this trial of men and their tenets: and so it establishes the right of private judgment. It shows also, that no pretences to the Spirit, to inspiration, or new revelations, are to be regarded as any thing better than Satanical delusions, when they are brought to disprove or oppose the fundamental doctrines delivered by the apostles; that even apparent miracles would be totally insufficient to authenticate an antiscritptural doctrine; and consequently that philosophical reasonings and human authority must be entirely disregarded. These premises conclude equally against Mystics, Enthusiasts, Papists, Socinians, and Deists; who may mutually despise and oppose each other, but all agree in setting up new lights, against the authenticated and complete light of divine revelation.—The apostle, therefore, exhorted his brethren, in examining and deciding, who spake by the Spirit of God, and who did not, to observe, that “every spirit which confessed Jesus Christ, as having come in the flesh, was of God.” (Notes, 2:18—25. Matt. 10:32,33. 11:25—27. John 16:14,15. 1 Cor. 12:1—3.) This must be understood of an intelligent confession of the doctrine, delivered by the apostles, concerning the Lord Jesus, his Person, and his offices. The reality of his human nature was, no doubt, peculiarly adverted to by the expression, “come in the flesh:” but, who could have doubted of his having been really a Man, if it had been generally understood and believed, that he was merely a Man? And if the apostle had not known, that, as “the Son of God,” he could have come otherwise than “in the flesh;” he would scarcely have noticed his “coming in the flesh,” as an essential part of this confession. For who would have said that John the Baptist, or John the apostle, came “in the flesh,” when they were employed in preaching the gospel? for they must have come in human nature, seeing they had no other nature. (Notes, 1 Tim. 3:16. Heb. 2:14,15.) But the coming of Christ in human nature, when God “the Word became flesh, and tabernacled among men,” was indeed essential to the apostle’s doctrine concerning his redemption. (Note, John 1:14.) So that they, who did not confess him as “come in the flesh;” or who advanced any tenets contrary to his being “the Christ, the Son of the living God;” or to any of those offices, which as God manifested in the flesh he was anointed to perform; were not of God, whatever pretences they advanced to inspiration, or whatever appearances they exhibited of miraculous powers. For the spirit, which suggested such heresies, was that “of antichrist;” and they who spake by it, were men of the same infidel, ambitious, and impious disposition, as the principal antichrist would be, of whose coming they had heard; and who in fact was already in the world, in the various “false prophets,” who in different ways, opposed the true doctrine of Christ; and of whom the grand antichrist would prove the genuine successor.—These heretics, whom the apostle here showed to be the forerunners of the principal antichrist, have been proved by learned men to be the very same persons, whose sentiments the Socinians, and some others, now adopt and patronize as primitive Christianity: and it is not very improbable that the most fatal prevalence of antichrist, which is yet supposed to be future, will be in the garb of infidelity, or open opposition to the Deity and atonement of Christ; that is, “denying that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is come in the flesh,” to be “the propitiation for the sins of the world;” and not in that of gross popery. cision their pernicious doctrines. (Note, 2:12—14.) This had been done through the teaching and assistance of “the Spirit of Christ,” who dwelt in them; and who was more powerful to uphold and preserve them, than the evil spirit, who dwelt and wrought in the deceivers, and in the whole world of unbelievers, was to assault or injure them. The undeniable and stupendous miracles also, as well as the holy lives, of true Christians and faithful ministers, had in many places given them decided advantages over the false teachers, and driven them away with disgrace. These indeed were “of the world,” though they professed to be Christians: they belonged to Satan’s kingdom; they were of a worldly disposition; and aspired at secular distinctions and advantages. They therefore, “spake of the world,” agreeably to its wisdom, maxims, and taste; so as not to offend, but to gratify, carnal men who loved the world; and to ensure their friendship, by flattering them, and giving them encouragement, while indulging their worldly lusts. (Notes, John 7:3—10. 14:15—17. 15:17—21.) On this account, “the world heard them” with approbation; they made rapid progress, had numerous followers, and drew off many unestablished professors of Christianity from their faithful teachers. But the apostle might say with confidence, of himself and of his brethren the other apostles, “We are of God;” and those who knew the holy and glorious character of God, and had an experimental acquaintance with him, through regeneration and by faith, adhered to their doctrine and instructions: whereas, those who were not “born of God,” and did not truly belong to him, would not hear them, but attended to the more amusing or flattering or indulgent speculations of other teachers. But by this token, all impartial inquirers might know “the Spirit of truth, and that of error:” for they, who were influenced by “the Spirit of truth,” adhered to the doctrine of the apostles, whilst their genuine piety and holiness showed that they belonged to God; but those who were guided by the spirit of error, opposed the doctrine of the apostles: and the worldly disposition and conduct of those who propagated and embraced their delusions, as well as the tendency and effects of them, showed evidently that neither they nor their religion were of God.—The same is the test and standard of truth to this day; nor can we, by any other rule “try the spirits, whether they be of God, or not.” (Notes, 1—3. Matt. 16:18,19.)—“Though the apostles be all dead; yet, as they speak in their divinely inspired writings, John in this passage declares, ‘that their writings are the test, by which the disciples of Christ, since the decease of the apostles, are to judge both of teachers and of their doctrine.’ Macknight. 7 Beloved, † let us love one another: for † love is of God; and † every one that loveth is born of God, † and knoweth God.

8 He † that loveth not, † knoweth not God; for † a God is Love.

Note.—The apostle here resumed his exhortation to those, who adhered to the true doctrine of Christ, that they would cultivate the most endeared affection towards one another: for this holy, spiritual, and self-denying “love is of God;” the effect and evidence of regeneration: insomuch, that every one, who thus loves Christians with special affection, and takes pleasure in doing them good, because of their likeness and relation to Christ, is certainly “born of God,” and has a saving knowledge of him; (3:14.) whereas he, who does not thus love the image of God in his people, and, in general, is not of a loving and benevolent disposition, is not “born of God,” and is destitute of any transforming knowledge of him. (Notes, 2:7—11. 3:13—15. 5:1—3. Gal. 5:22—26. 1 Pet. 1:22—25. 3 John 9—12.) For “GOD is LOVE,” or essential goodness and benevolence. It is, as it were, his very nature to be kind, to communicate life, and impart felicity; and to provide for the happiness of his creatures, in all cases and methods, which consist with his infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and holiness; for love must always be exercised, in entire consistency with these attributes, by the perfect Source of all excellence. “The earth is filled with the goodness of the LORD,” and doubtless the immensity of the creation is the same: holy angels derive from God complete and endless felicity, and rebellion alone has made any rational creatures suffer pain and misery. Being and happiness could not have been communicated, in that vast extent and degree, which they are and will be, without the creation of intelligent agents. These form a kingdom to be governed by a perfect law, and a righteous Sovereign. The very law of God is “love,” as well as his nature: love of him and of each other constitutes the sum of its holy, just, and kind requirements; and all would have been perfectly happy had all perfectly obeyed it. (Notes, Ex. 20:3. Lev. 19:18. Deut. 6:5. Rom. 7:9—12.) Unless infinite wisdom had seen it proper, that omnipotence should be unremittingly exerted, to prevent free agents from transgression, (which undeniable facts demonstrate that it did not;) this law must be guarded by sanctions: and those who break it must be exposed to a punishment proportioned to the offence. Thus love to creatures, at large, dictated both the law and its sanctions. When angels sinned, a God of love, in kindness to his obedient creatures, turned those from heaven to hell, who would have converted heaven into hell if they had continued there; except some other act of omnipotence had prevented it. When man’s apostacy took place, the love of God was shown, not only in sparing sinners, and giving them a rich profusion of temporal benefits, while the sentence denounced against them was in part respited; but in so ordering it, that even their pains, sorrows, and temporal death were expressive of his wise compassion, and tended greatly to prevent the multiplication of crimes, and the increase of condemnation. Especially, the provision of the gospel, for the forgiveness of sin and the salvation of sinners, in consistency with the glory of the law and justice of God, whilst present sufferings are made subservient to the final and eternal felicity of believers, undeniably manifests that "God is Love." So immense were the obstacles to be surmounted, and so astonishing the method, by which mercy is honorably exercised to rebels, deserving of eternal misery; that, even if the entrance of sin had been prevented, or impunity and recovery to holiness could have been insured to all transgressors without any such expedient, the love of God would not so clearly have appeared to be infinite and incomprehensible. Something we can now see of its immensity: and though impenetrable and incomprehensible mystery rest on many particulars respecting it; yet it will surely at length be seen, resplendent as the noon-day sun, that the most perfect love presided, when, in the infinite wisdom of God, the entrance of sin was permitted; and when infinite justice, holiness, and truth determined to leave many rebels in their impenitency, to be "vessels of wrath fitted for destruction;" as connected with the election, redemption, and sanctification of the "vessels of mercy, who are thus prepared before unto glory." So that, if wise and holy love, in its most perfect exercise towards universal being, through eternity, had required or even admitted of it; no pain would have been suffered by any creature, much less would any have been left to be finally miserable.—But to argue from hence, that none will be finally miserable, in direct opposition to his testimony, who is TRUTH, and a CONSUMING FIRE, as well as LOVE, is the height of impiety and presumption. What do we know, concerning the purposes of love, to unnumbered millions, through eternal ages, which may be answered, in the infinitely wise counsels of God, by leaving comparatively a small number of rebels, to the merited punishment of their crimes? Men might on the same principles argue, that prisons and executions could not have any place, in the dominions of an eminently benevolent prince: when, in reality, wise and equitable benevolence to numbers, would dictate severity to a few atrocious criminals, who would otherwise make multitudes wretched. (Notes, Prov. 20:3,26. 24:24,25.) Indeed we might as reasonably argue, that since "God is Love," there can be no such thing as misery in the creation; for omnipotence could certainly have excluded it: but if infinite wisdom, justice, holiness, and truth require, that Love himself should cause his creatures to endure anguish; (and here facts preclude the vain hypothesis, which speculation might otherwise have adopted;) no created understanding can determine, in what degree, to what duration, or in how many instances, the wise, righteous, and holy purposes of LOVE, may require the suffering of his rebellious subjects. So that, all arguments and calculations of this kind prove nothing, but the vain self-wisdom of foolish man, who deems himself competent to determine, what God ought to do, and what he will do; and, in this presumption, opposes his arguments to the explicit testimony of God himself: and professes to honor his love, while he treats his truth as a lie, and supposes his awful threatenings to be terrifying delusions, to frighten the ignorant part of mankind into good behavior, and to be despised by the more discerning! But it is enough for our purpose; that God has so shown himself to be LOVE in his dealings with us, that, after all our crimes, we cannot come short of eternal happiness, except through our unbelief and impenitent rebellion; while strict justice would have consigned us to hopeless and final misery, as soon as ever we transgressed our Creator's law.

9 In this <sup>b</sup> was manifested the love of God toward us, because that <sup>c</sup> God sent his <sup>d</sup> only begotten Son into the world, <sup>e</sup> that we might live through him.

10 <sup>f</sup> Herein is love, <sup>g</sup> not that we loved God, but that he loved us, <sup>h</sup> and sent his Son to be the Propitiation for our sins.

11 Beloved, <sup>i</sup> if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another.

12 No man hath <sup>k</sup> seen God at any time. If we <sup>l</sup> love one another, God dwelleth in us, <sup>m</sup> and his love is perfected in us.

Note.—In this, "the love of God towards us," the apostate, rebellious, and depraved offspring of fallen Adam, has been especially "manifested; because he sent his only begotten into the world, that we might live through him." Hence it appears, that Christ is called "the only begotten Son of God," previous to his incarnation, or coming into the world: and that the love of God, in giving his own Son to assume our nature, in order to his expiatory sufferings, was more stupendous, than even in giving him, as incarnate, to the death upon the cross for us. (Notes, John 1:18. 3:16—21.) When God in his infinite compassion and mercy designed so vast a blessing as "life eternal" for fallen men; his most perfect justice and holiness rendered it impossible for him to confer it, (for "he cannot deny himself;") except an all-sufficient atonement could be made for their sins: and when no other method, or none so proper for this end, was perceived by his infinite wisdom, as the sending of his own Son to be our Surety, and the atoning Sacrifice for our sins; ("he spared him not;") but sent him "into the world, that we might live through him." (Notes, Rom. 3:21—26. 8:32—34. Heb. 7:26—28. 10:3,4.) None of our words or thoughts can do justice to such gratuitous, abundant, astonishing love, of a holy God towards sinners; to whom he owed nothing; who could not profit, or harm him; whom he might justly have crushed in a moment; who were most decisively shown to be deserving of his tremendous vengeance, in the very method by which they were saved: and when he could, by his omnipotent word, have created countless worlds, replenished with far more exalted beings, if he had seen good. (Notes, Rom. 5:6—10,15—21.) Search we then the whole universe for LOVE, in its most enlarged and glorious displays? We must at length be constrained to own, that it is to be found in the Person and the cross of Christ. "Herein is love," the splendor of which eclipses all, which has been seen elsewhere, from the beginning of the world; and which will be the special subject of admiring and adoring praise to all eternity.—Does love subsist between God and sinners? Here was the origin of it: "not that we loved God;" for we were enemies to his holy character, law, sovereignty, worship, and providence; but that "he," most freely, and with most condescending compassion, forgiveness, and liberality, "loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." (Notes, 2:1,2. John 15:12—16.) In this great event, all holy beings will for ever see, that "GOD is LOVE;" and the more fully redeemed sinners understand this subject, the clearer views will they have of that love, which can never be perfectly comprehended: whereas, those who exclude this view of the divine benignity, may speculate about the subject, but can scarcely know any thing concerning its real nature and glory. If then "God hath so loved us," in providing salvation, and bringing us to partake of it; most certainly "we ought also to love one another," in imitation of his example, and in grateful obedience to his command; and to express this love, by a reciprocally forgiving, peaceable, kind, liberal, and compassionate conduct. For "no man hath seen God," in respect of his divine essence, at any time; save, that "he who hath seen Christ, hath seen the Father" also: we therefore best prove, that we love him, by loving his image in his people, and by doing good to them for his sake. (Notes, Job 22:1—4. Ps. 16:2,3.) Thus it will appear, that "God dwells in us," by his new-creating Spirit; and that his love has accomplished its object by producing its genuine effects upon our hearts, and in our renewal to his holy image.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostles knew, and true Christians might know, that they "dwelt in God" by faith, and he in them as in his consecrated temple, "because he had given them of his Spirit." (Notes, 3:18—24. Rom. 8:5—17.) For, besides the miraculous powers conferred on some, the Holy Spirit had so changed the hearts of all true believers, and so made them "partakers of a divine nature," that they loved the children of God with a holy love, and copied his example in their conduct to each other. Under this influence and energy, the apostles and others, who had seen Christ, and had long known and experienced his love, in all its inestimable fruits and consolations, did testify to their fellow sinners every where, that "the Father had sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world," and to confer pardon, grace, and eternal life, on all men, in every place, who sought them from the Father, through the propitiation of the Son, by living faith in his name. Whoever, therefore, should hear and receive this testimony, and "confess Jesus to be the Son of God," acknowledging the love of the Father in this gracious dispensation, cordially falling in with the design of it, and venturing the enmity of ungodly men, in professing the faith of the gospel, and obeying the divine Saviour, might be assured, that "he dwelt in God," as his Refuge and Rest, and that God dwelt in him, as his beloved temple. (Notes, 3:18—24. Is. 57:15, 16. 2 Cor. 6:14—18. Eph. 2:19—22.)—All such general expressions must be interpreted according to the context: for unless the confession of Christ were sincere, intelligent, and influential, the man could not be a partaker of holy love; and therefore the apostle would have contradicted what he before asserted, if he had meant a mere confession with the lips, without faith and grace in the heart (8). But true Christians had known, understood, and experienced, as well as believed, the love, which God had shown towards them, in the redemption of his Son; and it had had a transforming effect upon them, by bringing them to resemble God, in the nature and fruits of their love; and, by an habitual exercise of this holy affection towards God, each other, and all men; and to live in the most endeared and intimate union with him. Thus their love to the Lord was "made perfect," or produced its genuine and valuable effects, in their love to one another: and they cultivated this holy disposition, and acted from it, in order that they might have boldness in the day of judgment. (Notes, 2:26—29. Matt. 25:31—46.) Because as Christ was, so were they in this world: like him, they were influenced by holy love to do good to others in a self-denying manner; and, being treated with contempt, reproach, and enmity, they meekly and patiently endured it, and persevered in "doing good against evil" as he had done. Or, "as God is, so are they;" they bear his image, which the world hates: for this may be the meaning, and it is coincident with the preceding interpretation.

18 There <sup>b</sup> is no fear in love: but perfect love casteth out fear; because <sup>c</sup> fear hath torment. <sup>d</sup> He that feareth is not made perfect in love.

Note.—In loving God, through Jesus Christ, as this love is made perfect in loving Christians and all men for the Lord's sake, there is no terror: the obedience and good works performed from this principle, are not like the servile diligence of one, who reluctantly labors from dread of a hated master's indignation; but like that of a dutiful child, who performs services to a beloved father, which conduce to the benefit of his brethren and family; and are, on every account, pleasing, and voluntarily performed. (Notes, Ex. 20:18—25. 1 Sam. 12:20. Rom. 8:14—17. 2 Tim. 1:6—8.)—Reverence of the majesty of God, and fear of dishonoring him, are intimately connected with the most perfect exercises of holy love: but terrifying apprehensions of vengeance have no place in it; and cease, in proportion as love prevails, and inspires confidence and gratitude. So that "perfected love" of God (and of man for his sake,) must produce such full satisfaction of acceptance, such delight in his service, and such experience of his consolations, as to cast out all terror. This gives torment, or punishment, to the mind, from which "the Spirit of adoption" proportionably delivers the believer. The remains and returns of these terrors, therefore, in the experience of established believers, show, that they are not "perfected in love;" yet they have great use, in this state of conflict and imperfections, in all respects. The habitual prevalence of them however implies, that the persons concerned are not duly brought under the influence of "the Spirit of adoption," but serve God more from slavish fear, than from filial love. In heaven love will be perfect, and fear will be forever completely excluded; and in this world the more we obey God from love, and the less we need and experience that "fear, which hath punishment," at least castigation, the more of heaven we enjoy. Yet this does not imply, that any Christians are made absolutely perfect in love on earth, to the full demand of the divine law; or that slavish fears prove a man to have no love, or grace; or that exemption from fear of every kind, is the privilege of believers. It is equally true, "that blessed is he that feareth always," as that "perfect love casteth out fear:" for different kinds of fear are meant. (Notes, Prov. 28:14. Rom. 11:16—21. Heb. 4:1,2. 1 Pet. 1:17—21.)

It is, however, very often used in a good sense, for reverential fear.—Torment. Κολασιον. *Matt. 25:46. 19 We <sup>e</sup> love him, because he first loved us.

Note.—They who serve God from filial affection, not from slavish fear, "love him, because he first loved them." Not that their love is merely gratitude for previous benefits, which, abstracted from other exercises of love, would be only a selfish affection; and not at all that holy love, which the law as written in the hearts of all true Christians requires: for that love is commanded previous to the consideration of redemption, and our failure in it causes us to need that love of God towards us, of which the apostle was speaking. If mere gratitude for mercy and personal forgiveness were exclusively intended; no man could love God at all, on good grounds, without some immediate revelation, to assure him that he was the object of his special love, even while he continued altogether impenitent and sinful. (Note, Luke 7:44—50. P. O. 36—50.) But the evident meaning is, that if the Lord had not "loved them," before they loved him, "even when they were dead in sin," they must forever have continued enemies to him. (Note, 9—12.) His love suggested the plan, and provided the means, of redemption; he revealed to sinners his glorious perfections and abundant mercy, in the Person and work of his Son; he sent his word, to declare to sinners this great salvation, and to invite them to partake of it; he regenerated them by his Spirit, and so brought them, by repentance, and faith in Christ, into a state of acceptance and reconciliation; and thus he taught and enabled them to love his excellency, to value his favor, to be thankful for his inestimable benefits, and zealous for his glory. (Notes, Rom. 5:6—10. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Eph. 2:4—10. Tit. 3:4—7.) As, therefore, his love to them was the original source of their love to him; so, from the latter they might infer the former: if they were sure that they loved God, they might be sure that "he had first loved them," and they ought to take the comfort of the happy change, which had been wrought in them, whilst they gave him the whole glory of it.

20 If <sup>f</sup> a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God <sup>g</sup> whom he hath not seen?

21 And <sup>h</sup> this commandment have we from him, That he who loveth God love his brother also.

Note.—The love of God in Christ, produced in the heart of Christians, by "the Spirit of adoption," should be considered as the grand proof of their conversion: (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 8:29—31.) yet that love also must be tried, by its effects, in their temper and conduct towards their brethren. (Note, 5:1—3.) For if a man profess to "love God, and yet hate his brother," and either indulge habitual resentment against any one, or show a spiteful or selfish disposition, or contempt and enmity of the image of God in his children; he is no doubt "a liar," a false professor. —17.) For if a man do not love the holy image of God in his brother, “whom he hath seen,” and whose good behavior is sensibly endearing and advantageous to him; or refuses to show kindness to his brother in distress, when he knows this to be the commanded expression of love to God; how can he be supposed to love God, “whom he hath not seen,” whose perfection he can only contemplate at a distance, who is not visibly present to excite him to suitable returns of affection, and who cannot want, or be profited by any of his services? So that the pretence of loving God, when the love of the brethren is neglected, is no more than a cloke of selfishness, or an excuse for malignant passions. And indeed this is the express command of God, that our love to him should be shown by the love of our brethren: but how can he be supposed to love God, who habitually violates his command, and acts contrary to his most endearing example? (Note, 5:1—3.—Marg. Ref. h.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

We live in an age, in which but few advance claims to immediate revelations: yet we have at least as much cause to try men's doctrines and religion by the word of God, as they had in the primitive times. For “many false teachers are gone forth into the world;” who agree in scarcely any thing, but in denying “that the Son of God, is come in the flesh,” to be “the Propitiation for our sins,” and the anointed High Priest, Prophet, and King of his church; and the Saviour of a ruined world. If indeed no teachers, who do not confess the doctrine of the apostles, concerning the Person and salvation of Christ, “God manifested in the flesh,” “are of God,” which the apostle expressly asserts; and if all others are actuated by the lying spirit of antichrist; we may truly say, that antichrist did not much more prevail, in the darkest days of popery, than in these times of infidelity, skepticism, socinianism, arianism, mysticism, and antinomianism; whilst the scriptural doctrine concerning the Person, or some of the offices of Christ, seems to be wholly excluded from the religion of a large proportion among his professed disciples! nay, from that of some, who possess high authority and much influence in the church. But there is a remnant, “who are of God,” and who have overcome the assaults of all these deceivers, and will be finally victorious over them; because they are taught and kept by “the Spirit of Christ, who is greater” than the evil spirit, which still “worketh in the children of disobedience.” Indeed, they whose wisdom, principles, spirit, and conduct accord to the judgment and disposition of the world, will be heard, applauded, and followed by worldly men, as far as their consciences find it convenient to have some kind of religion, by way of an opiate: and as the way to destruction is broad and frequented, no wonder that they have the majority on their side; for in all ages and places hitherto, the friends of God have been comparatively few. (Notes, Matt. 7:13—20.) We must not indeed take it for granted, as the apostle did, that “we are of God:” or that “he who knoweth God heareth us:” but, as far as we can prove, that our doctrine, temper, and conduct, “accord to the oracles of God,” we may be confident, that he will maintain our cause, and that his friends and children will favor us: and the characters of the persons who adhere to the testimony of preachers, and that of those who reject it, may often go far in deciding, who they are that declare the humbling, holy truths of God, and who speak the dictates of “the spirit of error.” For numbers are incapable of doing so much honor to the ministry of the true servants of God in any other way, as they do by forsaking, deriding, and reviling it; whilst their actions show to all, who understand that most emphatical language, the strong reasons of their dislike. (Note, John 3:19—21. 7:3—10.)

V. 7—17.

Again and again, we are exhorted to “love one another, because love is of God:” in proportion as this love abounds in our heart, and regulates our behavior, we bear the image of God and show that we are “born of him, and know him.” Thus we anticipate the temper and happiness, and, as it were, breathe the air of heaven: whilst enmity, selfishness, malice, and revenge, are from hell, and the beginning of the misery “prepared for the devil and his angels” and children. But our “GOD is LOVE:” and with such displays of this endearing attribute before us, and such obligations as we are brought under to it; how large, liberal, and fervent ought our love of each other to be, and even that of our very enemies! Seeing that “God hath manifested his love towards us, in sending his own Son, to be the propitiation for the sins” of us rebels and enemies, “that we might live through him:” how earnest ought we to be, in using all means, with persevering self-denial, to promote the welfare, and save the souls, of those who are most injurious to us! And how should we lay ourselves out, to do good to our fellow Christians for the Lord's sake! Let us not then think it enough to admire the love of God in Christ Jesus: but, since we cannot profit him, “whom no man hath seen or can see;” let us show our love and gratitude to him, by imitating his kind and merciful conduct, in our dealings with our brethren and neighbors. Thus it will appear that he dwells and rules in our hearts; and “his love will be perfected in us.”—Whilst we profess to believe the doctrine which the apostles testified to mankind, and confess “that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world;” may our holy loving tempers show, that “he hath given us of his Spirit!” Then it will appear that we have understood the nature and glory, as well as believed the revelation, of “the love which God hath to us:” and that, as “God is love,” so “we dwell in love;” and “in God, and he in us.” In this way our love will grow unto perfection; and our confidence, before the mercy-seat, will be an anticipation of our “boldness in the day of judgment;” while we are conscious, that as he, our Lord and Saviour was, “so are we in this evil world.”

V. 18—21.

By “the work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope,” we shall, the most effectually, be relieved from slavish and tormenting fears: for the more we feel of the loving temper of children towards our Father, and of affection to our brethren for his sake; the less we shall fear being treated as enemies, and the fuller will be our assurance of the special love of God to us. Nor would there be occasion for our being left, to the painful restraint and impulse of terror, if we were more entirely "constrained by love," in every part of our duty: so that all our disquieting doubts, and apprehensions, arise from our not being made perfect in love. (Note, Jer. 32:39—41.) Let us then pray without ceasing, that we may more entirely "love him, who hath first loved us:" and if it be evident, that our natural enmity is changed into filial affection and gratitude; let us bless the name of our God for this seal and earnest of eternal felicity; and, in return for his mercy, and in obedience to his commandment, let us do good to our brethren also, and to all men, for his sake, and after his example; and thus show, that though our love is imperfect, yet that we essentially differ from all those, who profess "to love God whom they have not seen," and yet "hate their brethren whom they have seen."

CHAP. V.

The apostle shows the connexion between faith in Christ, regeneration, love to God and his children, obedience to his commandments, and victory over the world, 1—5. He states the manifold testimonies, by which the doctrine of Christ is proved; and declares the inseparable union between faith and eternal life, 6—13. He reminds Christians of the Lord's readiness to hear their prayers, for themselves and each other, 14, 15; gives an intimation of "a sin unto death," and the regenerate man's security against committing it, 16—18; he strongly marks the difference between the "world that lieth in wickedness," and true believers, 19, 20; and cautions Christians against idolatry, 21.

WHOSOEVER<sup>a</sup> believeth that Jesus is the Christ,<sup>b</sup> is born of God:<sup>c</sup> and every one that loveth him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of him.

2 By this<sup>d</sup> we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments.

3 For<sup>e</sup> this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: <sup>f</sup>and his commandments are not grievous.

Note.—Every man, who truly believes Jesus to be the promised Messiah, and receives, honors, and obeys him in that character, according to the predictions of the Old Testament, and the testimony of the apostles concerning him, is doubtless "born of God;" (Notes, John 1:10—13.) as this faith must be the effect of divine life, and cannot be separated from repentance, love, and other graces; or those good fruits which spring from them: and all, who credibly profess this faith, are entitled to that love which Christians owe to their brethren; whatever differences there might be in their previous character, abilities, rank, or situation. For every one who loves God, the Father of all the regenerate, must also love every one of his children: (Notes, 4:7, 8, 19—21.) even as men commonly love and show kindness to the offspring of their dear friends, and liberal benefactors. (2 Sam. 9: 19: 31—40. Notes, John 8:41—47. Philem. 8—11.) But, as every gracious affection might be counterfeited, it was necessary to observe, that this genuine "love of the children of God" might be distinguished from all natural benevolence, or party attachments, by its inseparable connexion with the love of God, and a cheerful upright obedience to all his commandments: for the same Spirit, who had brought the sinner's heart to love the image of God in his children, must also have taught them to love his holy character, precepts, and service. (Note, Jam. 2:8—13.) Christians might therefore know their love of the brethren to be spiritual, and evidential of their having "passed from death unto life;" by a disposition to love and obey God in all other respects: whereas that man could not truly love the children of God, who habitually committed known sin, or neglected known duty. (Notes, John 14:15—17, 21—24. 15:9—11.) So that these distinct parts of the Christian's character must reciprocally prove each other to be genuine. In fact, the nature, tendency, effect, and, as it were, the essence of love to God, consist in its disposing the heart to unreserved and cheerful obedience: and, as his commandments are "holy, just, and good," the rule of liberty and felicity; so they, who are "born of God" and love him, do not count or find them "grievous," but delight in obedience; and only groan and lament that they cannot serve him more perfectly. (Notes, Ps. 119:4, 5. Matt. 11:28—30. Rom. 7:22—25.) Indeed, the natural love of worldly objects, which is found in every human heart; and the fear of those inconveniences and sufferings, which the displeasure of ungodly men threatens and occasions (in some measure at all times,) to the faithful servants of God, render obedience, in the present state of things, arduous, and connected with self-denial, and various losses, perils, hardships, and distresses; from which, in other circumstances, it would be wholly exempted. But true Christians are possessed of a principle of divine life, which carries them above all these obstacles and impediments. (Note, 4, 5.)

Born of God. (1) Note, 5:16—18. Comp. 2:29. 3:9. 4:7.—Grievous. (3) Βαρβαρι. Matt. 23:4, 23. Acts 20:29. 2 Cor. 10:10. (Notes, Prov. 3:16, 17. Rom. 14:13—18. 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Phil. 4:10—13.)

4 For<sup>g</sup> whatsoever is born of God<sup>h</sup> overcometh the world: and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.

5 Who is he that overcometh the world,<sup>i</sup> but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?

Note.—"That which is born of God," that new and heavenly nature which is communicated in regeneration, tends so powerfully to God and holiness, and includes in its essence such a spiritual judgment, and such heavenly affections; that all, in whom it is found, are by it made victorious over the world; and overcome both their natural love for its honors, riches, pleasures, decorations, and friendship; and their natural fear of the frown, rage, and contempt of worldly men. ercising self-denial, and enduring affliction in the cause of God; and are taught to disregard the maxims, fashions, customs, and opinions of ungodly men, however eminent, numerous, or powerful. This "new creature," as "born of God," has the ascendancy in the heart of the youngest and feeblest true Christian; and therefore they all aspire after and attain unto this victory. For, though the conflict of grace with corrupt nature, and the allurements and terrors of the world, is often very sharp; and the regenerate man may be baffled, cast down, nay apparently slain in the battle: yet "his seed remaineth in him," and the divine life, being again invigorated by the Holy Spirit, will excite him to arise and renew the combat, with redoubled fortitude and resolution. So that at length the victory will be his decidedly; and he will habitually profess the truth, and do the will of God, as far as he knows them, whatever loss, suffering, disgrace, or hardship may ensue; even if he should be exposed to death, in its most terrifying form, by his adherence to his duty. In acquiring this honorable "victory," faith is principally concerned: a realizing belief of the testimony of God, concerning invisible and eternal things, operating by fear of his wrath, and hope of holy felicity in his favor; a believing reliance on Christ for redemption, and all the blessings that flow from it, working by love and gratitude; with an abiding sense of God's presence at all times, to witness every action, and to support, help, and comfort those who trust in him. These exercises of faith give such a determination to the true Christian's conduct, that he cannot habitually do what he knows to be contrary to the will of God, whatever emolument, credit, or favor he may acquire by so doing: nor can he habitually neglect what God commands, to whatever loss, reproach, or suffering it may expose him. (Notes, Rom. 6:1,2. 2 Cor. 4:13-18. Gal. 2:17-21. Heb. 11:27. 12:2,3. Rev. 12:7-12.) Through temporary weakness of faith, he may be drawn into sins and negligences; but he will soon find such fear, shame, sorrow, remorse, and self-abhorrence, in his heart and conscience; that he cannot but return into the way of obedience, and reject the wages of transgression, whatever may be the consequence. Nor can this ever be altered; unless it be possible, that "the shield of faith" should be finally torn from him. (Note, Luke 22:31-34.) This is universally the case with true believers; though the temporary suspension of faith, and a consequent prevalence of worldly affections, may be longer in some cases than in others; during which lamentable seasons, their evidence of sincerity must be equally weakened. And this is peculiar to believers; so that we may challenge the whole earth, to produce one instance of a man, who "did not believe in the Son of God," that had, in every respect, so "overcome" the love and fear of all persons and things in the world, as not habitually, in one way or other, to act contrary to his own judgment and conscience, from a regard to interest, reputation, ease, liberty, indulgence, friendship, or social and relative comfort and affection: or in order to avoid derision, reproach, the censure of singularity, or more material losses and sufferings. All men, except believers in Christ, are habitually enslaved, in some respect or other, to the customs, opinions, or interests of the world: and who is there, that dares, in all things, to act according to the conviction of his own mind, without being warped by the general influence of society, or that of his own particular circle, or sometimes even of his own domestics? He, and he only, can do this, who "believes that Jesus is the Son of God," and trusts in him for salvation, according to the scriptures: his faith, united with humble love, spirituality, fear of coming short of salvation, hatred of sin, a constant respect to his Lord's example, an indifference for worldly objects, and a deep persuasion of the miserable condition of all worldly men, gives him this victory. (Note, Gal. 6:11-14.) He habitually in all things follows the dictates of his own conscience, and the commandments of his Lord, whatever consequences may follow, and when he is betrayed into an incidental deviation from this rule, he deeply repents of it, and attempts renewed obedience.—Hence it is, that the world will tolerate all other persons, except true believers, whatever their forms or notions be; because all others will, in some respects, comply with the humors and court the friendship of worldly men. But Christians are so unpliant, and so determined to follow their Lord, according to their own judgment of truth and duty, without regarding the opinions, counsels, attentions, derision, revilings, or enmity of the many, the wise, the great, the learned, or the virtuous; nay, without being turned aside by persuasion, or the dictates of affection and gratitude, from the line of duty; they cleave to their religious singularities, (as they are deemed,) at so great an expense, and often amidst so many sufferings; and in so many ways, they "testify of the world, that its works are evil," and its wisdom folly; that they can hope for no quarter from worldly men, but must expect to be hated, or despised by all for Christ's sake: even as he was, who perfectly "overcame the world," as their Surety and example. It may be proper here to observe, that the Christian, in proportion to his knowledge and grace, will be singular, only where truth and duty require him; and steadfast, according to the certainty or importance of the truth and duty: but in all things which he deems indifferent, and where his own will or interest alone are concerned, he will endeavor to be pliant; in order to show, that his pertinacious adherence to his rule of duty, is the effect of conscientiousness, and not of obstinacy and affectation.

Whatsoever is born. (4) Παν το γεγεννημενον. Some read πας ο γεγεννημενος, every one who is born. The meaning is nearly the same; but it is not expressed so exactly and clearly, as in our reading, which is of far superior authority.—How can all these propositions concerning "him who is born of God;" and "all that which is born of God," be explained by those, who suppose that baptism, or something inseparably connected with it, when rightly administered, is exclusively meant?

and <sup>m</sup> blood, even Jesus Christ; not by water only, but by water and blood. And it is <sup>n</sup> the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit <sup>o</sup> is Truth.

Note.—Having mentioned Jesus “the Son of God,” the apostle observed, that this was the anointed Saviour “who came by water and blood.” As he entered on his ministry on earth, when he was baptized with water by John, and closed it by shedding his blood on the cross; so, after his death, “water and blood” flowed from his pierced side, as emblematical of the removal of our guilt by his atoning sacrifice; and the purifying of our souls by his grace, after his example, and according to his commandments. (Notes, John 19:31—37. 1 Cor. 6:9—11.) For “he came” to save sinners, “not by the water only”—not merely by teaching them the way of holiness, and enabling them to walk in it; “but by the water and the blood;” by atoning for their guilt, and thus making way for their sanctification, and the acceptance of their persons, and works of faith and love. To this the Holy Spirit bore witness, both in the miracles wrought by those who taught this doctrine, and the holy lives, the patient sufferings, and the abundant consolations of such as embraced it. (Notes, 7, 8. John 15:26, 27. Acts 5:32. Heb. 2:1—4.) This testimony of the Spirit to the doctrine of his atonement, as the Son of God, come in the flesh, to save sinners by his blood-shedding, could not be objected to, or rejected; “because the Spirit is the Truth,” “even essential Truth itself, which cannot possibly deceive or be deceived.” The two sacraments, of baptism with water, the outward sign of regeneration, and purifying from the pollution of sin, by the Holy Spirit; and that of the Lord’s supper, as the outward sign of the creatures of his body and the shedding of his blood, and the receiving him by faith, for pardon and justification, seem also intended. (Notes, 6, 7, 20, 21. 4:1—8. John 14:4—6, 15—17. 16:12, 13.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—These doctrines, concerning the Person and salvation of Christ, had been and were attested, in the most unexceptionable manner. For there were “Three,” who from heaven, the holy habitation, in which the divine presence and glory is peculiarly displayed, had borne witness to it: “The Father,” who repeatedly, in an audible voice from heaven, had declared Jesus to be his “beloved Son, in whom he was well-pleased;” (Notes, Matt. 3:16, 17. 17:5—8. John 12:27—33.) and had borne witness to the same truth, as well as to the acceptance of his sacrifice, by raising him from the dead: “the Word” who was himself God, as well as “from the beginning with God;” who had testified, that “He and the Father were One;” that “he who had seen him, had seen the Father,” and that “he would shed his blood a ransom for many;” while his miracles, and the fulfilment of ancient prophecies in him, the accomplishment of his own predictions in his resurrection, and various other events, showed his testimony to be divine, and that he came from heaven in human nature, to attest these truths to man: “and the Holy Ghost;” who descended from heaven, as a dove, and rested on Christ at his baptism; (Notes, Luke 3:21, 22. John 1:30—34.) who had “borne witness to him,” by the mouth of all his prophets from the beginning of the world; and who came forth from the Father and the Son, to attest his resurrection and exaltation to the mediatorial throne, by the gift of tongues, and other miraculous powers, communicated to the apostles on the day of Pentecost. These three divine witnesses, though personally distinct, were yet “One;” in the Unity of the Godhead, in a most mysterious and incomprehensible manner.—There were also “three that bear witness on earth,” perpetuating, as it were, the testimony of “the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit,” whose special abode is in heaven, and whose testimony was immediately from thence: even “the Spirit,” in the miraculous powers communicated to the disciples, by the laying on of the apostles’ hands; the sanctifying efficacy of their doctrine; the holy conduct and consolations of Christians; and the prophecies delivered to the new testament church, which would be fulfilled from age to age: “the water,” or the initiatory ordinance of baptism, by water, “into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit;” (Notes, Matt. 3:5, 6. 28:19, 20.) “and the blood,” or the Lord’s supper, which was appointed as a memorial and attestation of the sacrifice of the death of Christ, till his second coming; and which permanently testifies, that pardon and salvation may be obtained, by faith in the atoning blood of him, whose name is Emmanuel, who is “God manifest in the flesh,” and who will surely come to be our Judge; but in no other way. (Notes, 6. Matt. 26:26—28. 1 Cor. 10:14—17. 11:23—28.) As the accomplishment of the prophecies contained in the New Testament fully counterbalances the ceasing of miraculous gifts; so these divine attestations to the scriptural doctrine concerning the Person of Christ, and the two grand constituent parts of his salvation, continue to this present day, and shall to the end of the world; and we at present have abundant testimony to those truths, which our Father in heaven, the incarnate Word, and the Holy Spirit, immediately testified to the primitive Christians.—It is well known, that volumes have been written, concerning part of the seventh verse and the beginning of the eighth; in order to prove, or to disprove, the authenticity of the passage enclosed within crotchets.

It is certainly wanting in many of the ancient manuscripts and versions; and is not authenticated by many of the Fathers: but whether the Trinitarians interpolated it, or the Arians and Unitarians omitted it, is to this day a matter of controversy, and not likely to be fully determined. Upon such questions men will in general decide, according to their preconceived opinions: yet it is very wrong to deviate from truth in support of system. It is, however, perhaps somewhat more likely that the Arians or Anti-Trinitarians should silently omit in their copies a testimony which was so decisive against them, or that it should be left out by the mistake of some ancient transcriber than that the Trinitarians should directly forge and insert it. The Trinitarian, in fact, would be deprived only of one argument out of very many, with which he might attempt the conviction of his opponent, if this text were wholly rejected as spurious; for his doctrine is abundantly supported by other scriptures: but if this testimony were admitted as the unerring word of God; all the ingenuity and diligence of opponents, would scarcely suffice to explain it away, or to avoid the inference, which must naturally be drawn from it. It has indeed by some, even Trinitarians, been maintained, that the words rendered, "these three are One," only mean, that their testimony is one: but the writer of the passage, whoever he was, did not speak of testimony, but of persons: else, why is the word translated three, of the masculine gender? Or why is the expression so remarkably varied in the next verse? "These three," the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, "are One." It may also be doubtful, whether the passage connects with so much propriety, if the contested words be omitted, as it otherwise does: for if we read, with the copies in which they are wanting, "The Spirit beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth: for there are three that bear record, ... the Spirit, and the water, and the blood, &c." there seems to be a remarkable repetition, and a want of the apostle's usual energy in the passage: and it does not appear evident for what reason "the water and the blood," or the two great ordinances of the New Testament, as outward signs of sanctification and justification, by the grace and atoning blood of the Son of God, and as agreeing in One with the testimony of the Spirit, should be mentioned; and yet nothing should be hinted, concerning the testimony of the Father from heaven to Christ, as his beloved Son; or that of Christ himself, as confirmed by his miracles and resurrection, and the fulfilment of his promise in pouring the Holy Spirit on his assembled disciples. As the words stand in our copies, there is indeed a most abundant concurrence of divine testimonies to the Person and doctrine of Christ, pointed out in a most compendious and energetic manner.—It cannot, however, be expected, that in such a publication as this, a question, which has long employed the attention of the most learned men in Christendom, should be settled: and after assigning the above reasons in favor of the authenticity of the passage; I confess that I myself am very doubtful, whether they be sufficient to counterbalance the arguments of those who think otherwise. We need not, however, be anxious on the subject, as we have scriptural evidence in abundance, without this text, to confirm our faith in one God, subsisting in three co-equal Persons, "the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost," into whose One name we have been baptized.

9 If <sup>a</sup> we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for this is the witness of God, which he hath testified of his Son.

10 He <sup>b</sup> that believeth on the Son of God <sup>c</sup> hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God, <sup>d</sup> hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son.

Note.—The testimony of two or three credible men, was, by the law, deemed sufficient to prove any matter of fact; and almost all human affairs, even when the lives of men, or the interests of whole nations, lie at stake, are conducted and determined by "receiving the testimony of men." And though it is known, that all men are liable to be deceived or mistaken, and prone to deceive: yet he that should refuse to act upon human testimony, and should require another kind of demonstration, in all the various concerns of life, must soon, not only give over all business, but refuse his most needful sustenance. If then, "the testimony of man" must be received, how absurd is it to reject that of God! This must be "greater," or more indisputably certain; (3:20.) as "he knoweth all things," cannot mistake or be imposed on, can have no possible inducement to deceive his creatures, is essential Truth, and "cannot lie". (Notes, 6. Ps. 19:7—11. Is. 8:20.) "The testimony of God" is therefore the highest kind of demonstration: and we only need inquire into the evidence, or proof, that he has spoken; and into the meaning of his words, in which the honest, humble, and diligent inquirer will not be left greatly to mistake; and then we obtain the utmost certainty which can be conceived, in things of the highest possible importance. (Notes, Heb. 11:1,2. 1 Pet. 3:13—16.) Thus faith appropriates the information, contained in "the testimony of God," and in a most compendious manner renders a man "wise unto salvation."—For the principal truth, which "God hath testified" in his holy word, is that which relates to his Son, and to the way of salvation through him. (Notes, 11, 12. John 5:31—47. 20:24—31.) He, therefore, who credits "the witness" or testimony "of God," will "believe on the Son of God," and rely on him for the blessings, which he came into the world to procure for sinners by his righteousness and redemption, and to bestow on them. In consequence of this faith, the Christian receives another, and still more satisfactory testimony to the truth of the gospel, which also seals to him his interest in Christ and his salvation. For "he that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness" or testimony "in himself." The discoveries made to him of the glory of God in the Person of Christ, and the change thus produced in his judgment, dispositions, and affections; (Notes, 20, 21. 2 Cor. 3:17, 18. 4:5, 6.) the views which he has received of the evil of sin, of his own character and condition, of the deceitfulness and wickedness of his heart, and of the wretched state of the world around him, all of which he now perceives to accord exactly with the declarations of scripture, though once he saw nothing of it; the victory which he is enabled by faith to obtain over the world, his own evil habits and propensities, and the temptations of Satan; the evident answers which many of his prayers receive, and his experience of the faithfulness of God to his promises, and of his providential regard to him; and, above all, "the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Spirit of adoption;" the peace, hope, and consolation connected with it; the pleasure he finds in communion with God, and obedience to his will; his delight in the society of spiritual persons, and the support which he receives when afflicted; these, and similar experiences, form a "testimony in himself," to which all other men must be strangers. For thus "the Spirit of God witnesses with his spirit, that he is the child of God," and gives him sweet earnestness and foretastes of his eternal inheritance. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 8:14—17.) This puts the matter out of all doubt with him; (except in hours of peculiar darkness, conflict, temptation, or humiliating correction;) and he can no more be argued out of his belief of the leading truths of the gospel, respecting the Person and salvation of Christ, by any ingenuity or sophistry of infidels or heretics, than he could be convinced by logic, that the sun is a dark, cold body, when he sees its light, and feels its genial warmth. This testimony proves that the scripture is the word of God, that he rightly understands the most essential parts of it, and that he is a partaker of the blessing thus announced to him. (Notes, John 14:15—24. 2 Cor. 1:21, 22. 2 Pet. 1:19—21. Rev. 2:17.) On the other hand, he who believeth not God, in respect of his testimony to his Son, can never receive "the witness in himself;" but must expect his heavy displeasure; seeing "he maketh God a liar" or treats his word as a lie, as utterly unworthy of credit or confidence. This is the case of every one, "who believes not the testimony which God hath given of his Son," and confirmed in all the ways above enumerated. As all revelation centres in this fundamental doctrine, it is in vain for a man to plead, that he believes "the testimony" of God in other things, while he rejects it in this. His opinion may indeed accord with the doctrine of scripture, in matters less affronting to human pride, more level with the human understanding, or more reconcilable to the love, friendship, and pursuits of the world. Thus a man assents to scriptural truths, because he thinks they may be otherwise proved; at least there is no other evidence to be opposed to "the testimony of God," and nothing to be lost by assenting to it. But if his own reasonings, or those of some philosopher, lead to a conclusion contrary to the word of God; he will "lean to his own understanding;" or believe in a philosopher, and treat "the testimony of God as a lie." Nay, men professing to believe the scriptures will reject doctrines expressly revealed there, or employ a perverse diligence and ingenuity to explain them away, merely because they can find no philosophical arguments, with which to confirm the testimony of God! The light of the sun is not sufficient for them, nor will they be satisfied with it, unless they can see the same objects by their own dim candle! On the other hand, they will profess to believe the word of God, when it accords with their own reasonings, or the opinion of some philosopher; who perhaps borrowed that glimmering from scripture, which preserves his scheme from total darkness: and they sometimes suppose themselves doing good service, when they call such witnesses to support "the testimony of God!" So that, in fact, they do not believe God, but other witnesses, when they assent to scriptural truth: for they directly treat him as a false Witness, when he contradicts their pre-conceived opinions. It is therefore evident, that no belief of the Bible, or of any thing revealed in it, is of any avail to salvation, except a man believe "the testimony, which God hath given of his Son." (Notes, 11, 12. John 3:12—21, 27—36.)

12 He <sup>h</sup>that hath the Son hath life; <sup>i</sup>and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life.

Note.—"The record," or testimony, "of God," concerning which the apostle had repeatedly spoken, might be summed up in few words, as to its grand outline: "God hath given," of his free mercy and bounty, "to us," men, sinners, rebels and enemies, even to all of our fallen race, who are willing to accept, of the inestimable gift in his appointed way, "eternal life," everlasting felicity, with every thing pertaining to it: "and this life is in his Son;" in his Person, as "God manifested in the flesh;" (Note, 1 Tim. 3:16.) and in his mediatory offices, as having all fulness in him, in consequence of his atoning sacrifice, for the pardon, sanctification, and salvation of every believer. (Notes, John 1:16. Col. 2:1—10.) So that this eternal life must be obtained and enjoyed, by union and communion with Christ, both in respect of the title to it, the meanness for it, and the earnestness and the full and final possession of it. (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Col. 3:1—4.) He, therefore, "that hath the Son, hath life;" he that by true faith receives Christ, as the Son of God; and as his Prophet, High Priest, and King; his "Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption;" who humbly depends on him for all these purposes, and is thus interested in him, and vitally united to him, and continually seeks, and derives the blessings of salvation from him, through the influences of the Holy Spirit; "hath life," is spiritually alive, has the promise of eternal life ratified to him, and the sure earnest of it in his soul, which shall certainly be completed in his everlasting felicity. (Notes, John 1:10-13. 5:24-27. 11:20-27. 14:4-6.) "And he, that hath not the Son of God, hath not life:" he, who denies him to be truly and properly "the Son of God," and refuses to trust and honor him as such, or who disdains to submit to his teaching as his Prophet, to rely on his atonement and intercession as his High Priest, or to obey him as his King, "hath not life;" he is "dead in sin," under condemnation, and "the wrath of God abideth on him:" nor will any morality, learning, philosophy, forms of religion, doctrinal notions, or enthusiastical confidences, at all avail him. (Note, Gal. 5:1-6.) For Christ is the believer's "Life;" and if a man do not live in Christ, by "faith working by love" and by the supply of his Spirit, he has no life, whether he be an Infidel, a Socinian, or an Arian, a Pharisee, a Mystic, an Enthusiast, or an Antinomian. (Notes, 2:20-25. Matt. 11:25,26. John 5:20-23.) To have Christ, we must "receive him" and abide in him, for all the purposes for which he came into the world: we cannot truly receive him in one character, whilst we reject him in another. He will not protect, deliver, or accept services, as a King, from those who will not be taught by him, or who despise or neglect his precious redemption and all-prevailing intercession; and he will not save, as a High Priest, those "who will not have him to rule over them."

Note.—(Marg. Ref.) The apostle wrote the things above stated, unto those, who believed on the name of the Son of God, to confirm their faith, and to put them upon their guard against the seductions of false prophets; to assure them that theirs was the true religion of Christ, and that "in him they had eternal life:" (Note, 1 Pet. 5:12.) and to encourage their hope, that they might, more constantly and vigorously, exercise and profess this "faith in the Son of God," amidst all the delusions, persecutions, and tribulations with which they met.—The epistle might be, as indeed it has been, very useful to other descriptions of men; but this was the primary intent of it.

Note.—The confidence, which established Christians had in God, respecting the promise of "eternal life in his Son," had an especial reference to his readiness to answer their prayers, through the heavenly Advocate, notwithstanding their sinfulness. They were assured, "that if they asked any thing," however great or difficult, "according to his will," after the prescribed manner, in humble faith, hope, and uprightness; grounding their requests upon his promises, and submitting themselves to his wise and righteous providence; "he certainly heard them" and accepted of their worship. (Notes, Jam. 4:1-3. 5:16-18.) And, knowing this, they were thence assured, that they had the "petitions which they desired of him:" being confident that his omnipotence would certainly effect the purpose of his love, and fulfil his faithful promises. In some things their prayers were evidently and speedily answered; in others, they might be satisfied that they were granted in the best manner, though not exactly as they expected. (Note, 2 Cor. 12:7-10.) Even when their requests were for the present denied, they might make themselves sure, that in the best time and way they would at length be answered, in case this was for the glory of God, and their own real and abiding advantage; which would compose their minds, even as if they had already obtained their petitions. any sharp chastisement. In general they might be assured, that the Lord would graciously accept and answer these prayers; and in answer to them, "grant repentance unto life" to such as "had sinned, but not unto death," and that he would remove the corrections, with which they had been visited. (Note, Jan. 5:16—18.) Yet they must observe, that "there is a sin unto death," which would be an exception to this rule; nor were they required or encouraged, to pray for those who had committed it.—It had been shown, that apostacy, after an intelligent and credible profession of the gospel, when connected with strong expressions of enmity, could seldom be separated from "the sin against the Holy Spirit." (Notes, Matt. 12:31,32. 2 Tim. 4:14,15. Heb. 6:4—8. 10:26—31.) This, no doubt, was "the sin unto death," which the apostle intended: and, when it appeared evident, that any person had committed it, Christians were directed to leave him to the righteous judgment of God, without expecting to see him "renewed to repentance," or even praying for him. (Notes, Jer. 7:16. 14:10—12. 15:1.)—Indeed "all unrighteousness," or every deviation from the perfect rule of righteousness, "is sin," and so deserves death, or final condemnation, according to the law; (Note, 3:4—6.) and all who turn aside from the gospel, or act contrary to it, merit this punishment. Yet "there is a sin," even of this kind, "which is not unto death;" for, being the effect of surprise rather than of deliberate enmity, many, who have been thus overcome in the moment of temptation, have been recovered: so that Christians were admonished to pray for their brethren when grievously fallen, if they did not see in them the marks of determined obstinacy and enmity.—The apostle had before observed that none, "who had been born of God," could "work or practise sin;" (Note, 3:7—10.) and he here added, that none of them were left to commit the unpardonable sin: for though such apostates "had gone out from them, they had not been of them." (2:19.) The man, who, as "born of God," does not allow himself in any sin, but watches and prays, in faith, fear, and love, to be preserved from temptation, or supported under it, "keeps himself," by the Holy Spirit, out of the way of this fatal transgression: so that "the wicked one," by whom hypocrites and formalists are overcome and induced to apostatize, is not allowed access to him, or can make no impression on him.—Satan obtained leave to "sift" all the apostles, and he grievously baffled and wounded Peter; but he could touch none of them, except hypocritical Judas, so as to prevail with them deliberately to renounce and betray their Lord: (Notes, Luke 22:31—34. Rom. 7:15—17.) for "the incorruptible seed abode in them," in the genuine faith, love, and integrity produced by it; and therefore they "could not" thus "sin, because they were born of God." (Notes, 1 Pet. 1:3—5,22,23.)—Born of God. (18) Ἰγεννημενος ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ. "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God" (1). "Whosoever is born of God overcometh the world." "Whosoever is born of God sinneth not, but he that is begotten of God (ὁ γεννηθεῖς) keepeth himself, &c." "Every one that doeth righteousness is born of him." (2:29.) "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin: for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." (3:9.) "Every one that loveth is born of God." (4:7.) "Every thing forming an essential part of Christianity is inseparably connected with being "begotten" or "born of God:" and it is evidently intended, that they all co-exist in the regenerate.—But would the apostle have reversed these propositions? Would he have said, "He that believeth not that Jesus is the Son of God, is not born of God?" "That which does not overcome the world is not born of God." "He who doeth not righteousness is not born of God." "He that committeth sin is not born of God." "He who loveth not is not born of God." Doubtless he would. But would he have said, "He has not been baptized?" This is sufficient to expose the absurdity of baptism and regeneration, being considered as the same thing, or inseparably connected.

Note.—The apostle, and such established Christians as had "the witness in themselves," in their conscious love to God and each other, hatred of sin, and victory over the world, knew assuredly that they "were of God," born of God, his servants and worshippers, his children and heirs. (Note, 9,10.) And they also clearly perceived, that "the whole world lay in wickedness," or "under the wicked one." All the human race, unless "born of God," and become a part of Christ's kingdom, abide in subjection to the devil, (who is "the god" and "prince of this world,") and are his vassals and slaves: they willingly do what he requires of his slaves, though perhaps not aware that they are serving him. They are "overcome by him, and brought into bondage" to him: they bear his image; and copy his example of pride, envy, malice, deceit, murder, mischief, slander, apostacy, rebellion, ingratitude, and enmity against God. They do "the works of the devil," and concur in supporting his cause: they have neither wisdom, power, nor will to deliver themselves; and they all must for ever have continued in this dreadful state, if Christ had not "come to destroy the works of the devil." (*Notes, 3:7—10. 4:4—6. John 8:37—47. 12:27—33. 2 Cor. 4:3,4. All "lie in wickedness," under the power of unrepented and unmortified sin; or "under the wicked one," as in some way or other doing him service; those only excepted, who "are delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of the Son of God." This, the well instructed and established Christian knows assuredly: and the criminality, slavery, and misery of the human race excite his lamentations, prayers, and endeavors to spread the gospel; as the only method, by which they can be delivered from their abject condition. (Notes, Rom. 10:12—17. Eph. 2:11—13.) Yet other men perceive nothing of it; but are exceedingly offended at the declaration, and at the endeavors used, “to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.”—As the apostle made no exception, in favor of unbelieving Jews in his day; so we can allow of none, in favor of unbelieving, heretical, and worldly and unregenerate men, called Christians, in this present time.

Note.—The apostle, and his brethren also, “knew, that the Son of God was come; and that he had given them an understanding, to know him that was true:” (Notes, Luke 21:12—19. 24:44—49. 2 Cor. 4:5,6.) so that their believing, experimental, and sanctifying knowledge of the Son of God, as “the true and faithful Witness,” the “Truth and the Life;” and of “the only true God in him,” (Note, John 17:1—3.) was the effect of divine grace, through “the Spirit, who is Truth” (6). Thus, having the “witness in themselves,” they knew that they “were in him that is true,” coming to the true and eternal God by faith, cleaving to him, abiding in him as their Rest and Refuge, and living in him by his indwelling Spirit. “Even in his Son Jesus Christ:” by union with Christ they were thus spiritually united unto God; because “He and the Father are one.” (Notes, John 10:26—31. 17:20—23.) “This person is the true God, and eternal life.” (Note, 1:1,2.) The language here used is peculiarly to be noted: it is not obvious to determine, in some of the clauses, whether the Father or the Son was intended: but when “the Son of God, even Jesus Christ” had been mentioned; the apostle made use of a personal pronoun, often improperly rendered “this man,” when applied to Christ, but commonly signifying this Person. This demonstrative pronoun has Jesus Christ for its immediate and evident antecedent: and, having said “this Person is the true God, and eternal Life;” the apostle concluded, by solemnly cautioning his beloved “children” to “keep themselves from idols;” which must imply, that they would do this, by adhering to the worship of the Son, as “the true God and eternal Life;” and as One with the Father who sent him. The scripture, and the New Testament especially, was expressly intended, to draw men off from the worship of idols of every kind, to “serve the One, living, and true God:” and can it possibly be imagined, for a moment, that an inspired writer should speak in this manner of Jesus Christ, if he had not been, equally with the Father, the proper object of all adoration? If the worship of the Son of God be idolatry, (as it must be, if he be no more than a creature,) surely the apostle introduced his caution against idols in a very unaccountable manner! But if the triune JEHOVAH, “the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit,” three Persons in One undivided Godhead, be the Object, and the only Object, of divine adoration: nothing could be more proper and emphatical: for the Jews, rejecting the Son, and professing to worship God in One Person, (as the Mohammedans, Deists, Socinians, and others in after ages, have done,) had really changed the true Object of worship, the God of the Bible, for an imaginary Being; and could not be excuplated from the charge of idolatry: for they could not be discriminated from those, who worshipped the Supreme Being, under the name of Jupiter, or Baal. (Notes, 1 Kings 18:17—21.) So that nominal Christians, in these days, (and not only in the church of Rome,) have more need to be warned to “keep themselves from idols,” than it is generally supposed; and to be careful, that they adore the triune God, in whose name Christ commanded, that his disciples should be baptized: and that, whilst they “bow their knees to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus,” they forget not to “honor the Son even as they honor the Father who sent him,” (Notes, 2:20—25. John 5:20—23. 2 John 7—11.) in dependence on the omnipresent and divine Spirit, and under his guidance; that “the grace of the Lord Jesus, and the love of God the Father, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost,” “may be with them at all times.” (Notes, Matt. 28:19,20. 2 Cor. 13:11—14, v. 14.)—We know. (20) Is there in these clauses nothing like personal assurance of acceptance and salvation, arising from inward consciousness of having been enlightened in that knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ, which is eternal life?—Him that is true. (20) Τὸ ἀληθινὸν. Rev. 3:7,14.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

True faith in Christ always springs from regeneration; and all, who are not “born of God,” are either infidels and avowed unbelievers, or have only a dead and unprofitable faith.—Real Christians “show their faith by their works:” they “love God;” and all whom they judge to be his children; and this is proved to be genuine, by the pleasure which they take, in keeping their Father’s commandments. For, instead of deeming them “grievous,” they seek liberty and happiness in obeying them. By a new and divine nature, and the grace of the Holy Spirit, and by the exercise of faith in the testimony, the promise, the power, and the love of God, they gradually acquire “a victory over the world;" and learn habitually to do the will of God, without being seduced, persuaded, or affrighted from it, by any persons or objects in the world around them. Indeed this victory cannot be acquired without conflict; and it is never absolutely perfect in this life: yet our faith prevails so far above what any other principle can do, that we may boldly say, "Who is he, that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?" Let then all who profess to believe the gospel, inquire, whether they have attained, or are contending for, this victory. For we must all, after Christ's example, "overcome the world," or it will overcome us to our final ruin." (John 16:33.)—Indeed a worldly religion, exhibiting the appearance of evangelical doctrine, is the peculiar danger of the present day, and gives infidels and heretics of every name their chief advantage, against the great and glorious truths of the sacred scriptures. The gospel, which is so abundantly attested, by all the Persons in the Godhead, by miracles and prophecies, by the peculiar ordinances of the new dispensation, by the holy lives, patient sufferings, and joyful deaths of apostles, evangelists, and martyrs, relates especially to Emmanuel, to the efficacy of his atoning blood, and "the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience;" and as the miraculous powers communicated by the Holy Spirit bore witness to the apostle's doctrine; so his new-creating work in our hearts, manifested in our holy lives, attests our interest in the great redemption of the Son of God: nor can this deceive us, "because the Spirit is Truth." As Jesus, therefore, "came not by water only," or by blood only, "but by water and blood;" let us never attempt to separate what God has thus joined together: for the holy lives of all, who profess the doctrine of grace, is that testimony to the truth, which is at present principally wanting, in order to "stop the mouths," and silence the objections, of all who oppose them.

V. 9—13.

Nothing can be more absurd, than the claim of those men, who will be satisfied with nothing but strictly logical demonstration in matters of religion: whilst, in the ordinary affairs of life, they do not hesitate to proceed on credible human testimony, and would deem him out of his senses who refused to do so: whereas, if "we receive the witness of men," surely "the witness of God is greater!" Indeed, it is impossible, that the invisible things of God and the eternal world should be known, except by faith receiving the information of divine revelation: for in what other conceivable way can we know the incomprehensible perfections of God, his inscrutable counsels, or the manner in which he will show mercy to his rebellious creatures? These are not subjects for man to discover, to know, or demonstrate, by speculation or abstract reasonings: but will always be best understood by those, who most simply believe the "sure testimony of God" respecting them. And indeed "they, who believe in the Son of God," have an inward testimony to the truth, through the illumination, renewal, and consolations of the Holy Spirit, and in their own happy experience; which, when possessed in a large degree, is a rational foundation of the most entire confidence, that can possibly be had by those who have not come to the immediate vision and enjoyment of God. But can it be expected, that this "secret of the Lord" should be with those," who do not believe his word, and who treat Him, who is the Truth itself, as a liar and deceiver? This is the case of all, "who believe not the record which God hath given of his Son:" and it does not become them to censure the steadfastness of experienced Christians as obstinacy, or their consolations as enthusiasm, when these are so fully warranted by the word of God. Disregarding then the self-wise reasonings of such incompetent judges, let us thankfully receive the record of Scripture, that "God hath given us eternal life, and that this life is in his Son; he who hath the Son hath life, and he who hath not the Son of God hath not life." Thus we "may give diligence" to obtain an assurance of our interest in Christ, and know that we have eternal life; and daily grow stronger in faith, more steadfast and rejoicing in hope, "and always abounding in the work of the Lord; knowing that our labor is not in vain in the Lord."

V. 14—21.

Confiding in the love of our heavenly Father, and coming to him through our great Advocate; we may be assured that he always hears, accepts, and answers all those prayers, which accord with his will, and tend to our real benefit. We should therefore abound in supplication for our brethren, as well as for ourselves; especially seeking to the Lord to pardon and recover the fallen, as well as to relieve the tempted and afflicted: and, as we cannot know, who has "sinned unto death;" we should not readily yield to discouragement, respecting those whom we once considered as brethren. We ought to be very thankful, that no "sin is unto death," according to the gospel, of which a man truly repents: and that God will enable all those who are born of him to keep themselves, that "the wicked one" may never prevail on them to sin, in the manner they do who are "given up to a reprobate mind."—If we have so grown in faith and grace, as to "know that we are of God;" we shall readily perceive that "the whole world lieth in wickedness," and under the power of Satan: this will show us how vast our obligations are to redeeming love, and special grace; and it ought to excite our constant prayers and unremitting endeavors, to promote the preaching of the gospel, and the conversion of sinners, at home and abroad, even to the ends of the earth, by every means in our power. Happy are they, who "know that the Son of God is come," and to whom God "hath given an understanding to know," and a heart to rely on, "him that is true!" May this be our privilege; may we "dwell in Christ, and Christ in us;" may we be "one with him, and he with us;" for "This is the true God and eternal life:" thus our fellowship will be with the Father and the Son, through the Spirit and we shall be preserved from all idols and destructive heresies, and from the idolatrous love of worldly objects; and be "kept by the power of God through faith unto eternal salvation." (Note, 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF JOHN.

THIS short epistle, and that which follows, being written, as it is probable, not long before the apostle's death, and neither to any church by name, nor to the churches at large, but to individuals; were not generally and unanimously known and acknowledged to be written by him, in the earliest ages, in the decided manner, that the preceding epistle was: but their coincidence with it, in sentiment, manner, and language, satisfied all concerned at an early period, that they were written by the same person. Mill observes, that of the thirteen verses in this epistle, eight may be found in the first, either in sense or in expression.—The word rendered, "The elder," might probably be applied to St. John, when all the other apostles were dead, as a title of honorable distinction; for he was the Senior of the whole church: or he might modestly, yet as claiming authority, assume it on this occasion. Some have conjectured, that the church of Jerusalem was figuratively meant by "The elect lady;" and that of Ephesus, where John is supposed to have at this time resided, by "her elect sister;" but it has more generally been thought, that an eminent and honorable Christian matron, well known in the church, was addressed by the title of "the elect lady," and that some other honorable Christian woman, nearly related to her, was intended by "her elect sister" (13). On any supposition, however, the title of catholic, cannot properly belong to it; (Preface to the first of Peter;) as the writer's purpose of visiting, in a short time, those whom he addressed, is alone a sufficient proof.—It is supposed, that the apostle especially intended, in this epistle, to put those to whom he wrote on their guard against such heretics, as affirmed that Jesus was not really a Man, but only appeared to be one; and appeared to do and suffer those things, which the apostles and evangelists recorded of him. This heresy was, in its consequences, subversive of Christianity; which accounts for the decided language of the writer against those teachers who held it. (Note, 7—11.) The same decided conduct is, however, equally needful, reasonable, pious, nay charitable, in the true sense of the word, in respect of those who propagate many other opinions, subversive of the gospel: who yet exclaim against the bigotry of those, however benevolent and beneficent in all other things, who determine not to be "partakers of their evil deeds."

A. D. 90.

A. D. 90.

The apostle addresses, with expressions of affectionate regard, and with salutations, "the elect lady and her children," declaring his joy in their good behavior, 1—4. He exhorts them to brotherly love and obedience, 5, 6. He warns them against deceivers, that neither they, nor he, may lose their full reward, 7, 8; and against giving the least countenance to those, who did not bring the true doctrine of Christ, 9—11. He hopes to see them shortly, and concludes with salutations, 12, 13.

2 For <sup>e</sup> the truth's sake, <sup>f</sup> which dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever.

3 <sup>g</sup> Grace * be with you, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, <sup>h</sup> the Son of the Father, <sup>i</sup> in truth and love.

Note.—The aged apostle seems to have written this short letter, about the time when he wrote his general epistle, or something later; and he only styled himself "the Elder," (1 Pet. 5:1.) knowing that the honorable matron, whom he addressed, would be satisfied from whom she received it; and properly regard it, without a more explicit declaration of his authority. She seems to have been a person of superior rank; he did not scruple to give her the title of honor, which custom had allotted to her; and his acquaintance with her "work of faith, her labor of love, and her patience of hope," satisfied him concerning her "election of God." (*Note, 1 The. 1:1—4.*) He also addressed her children, who were trained up in religion, and some of them at least were partakers of her grace. (*Note, 2 Tim. 1:5—5.*) He assured them, that "he loved them in the truth;" in sincerity, and as united by the bond of "the truth of the gospel," which they all believed. Nor was this peculiar to the aged apostle: for all those loved them, who had understood and "known the truth;" that is, all such as were acquainted with this matron and her family. This affection was borne to them, "for the truth's sake, which dwelt" both in his and her children, and in those who loved them; and which would be "with them for ever," as the incorruptible seed of eternal life. (*Notes, John 15:6—8. Col. 3:16, 17. 1 Pet. 1:22—25. 1 John 3:7—10.*)—The same, or a similar benediction, has repeatedly been considered; (*Notes, Rom. 1:5—7. 1 Cor. 1:3.*) except as

Note.—The apostle had either met with the children of this honorable matron, in some place whither he had journeyed, and found that they "walked in truth;" and evinced their sincerity in professing the gospel, by an habitual conduct consistent with it: or he had witnessed this when he was with them. It however gave great joy to his benevolent and pious mind, to see them tread in their honored parent's steps, and likely to be instrumental in their future lives to the support of the gospel.

5 And now I beseech thee, lady, <sup>m</sup> not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, <sup>n</sup> that we love one another.

9 Whosoever transgresseth, <sup>x</sup> and abideth not in <sup>y</sup> the doctrine of Christ, <sup>z</sup> hath not God. <sup>a</sup> He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, <sup>b</sup> he hath both the Father and the Son.

10 If there <sup>c</sup> come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, <sup>d</sup> neither bid him God speed:

11 For he that biddeth him God speed is <sup>e</sup> partaker of his evil deeds.

Note.—The influence of the false teachers tended to produce disunion among Christians, as well as to pervert and mislead the unstable. (Notes, 1 John 2:18,19. 4:1—6.) It therefore behoved those, to whom this epistle was addressed, and all into whose hands it might come, to be upon their guard, and "to take heed to themselves," to their principles, spirit, and conduct: (Notes, Matt. 24:4,5,23—25. Heb. 12:15—17.) lest the labor of their ministers should prove fruitless, and their expectations be disappointed; and lest even their own losses, self-denial, and diligence in the cause of the gospel, should prove of no use to them. This would be wholly the case of apostates; and in some degree of those, who were seduced into heretical opinions and an inconsistent conduct. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:10—15. Gal. 4:8—11. Phil. 2:14—18. Rev. 3:10,11.) Whereas the apostle's desire was, that he and they together might receive a full reward; which would be the case, if they were steadfast in the faith and obedience of the gospel: as this would at present recompense him, by his joy in them, for all his labors on their account; and they would at last be "his crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ."—But, whosoever transgressed, habitually and with allowance, the commandments before spoken of; or "abode not in the doctrine of Christ, had not God" for his Father and Portion; as he only, who "abode in that doctrine," was partaker of the special love of the Father, and the redemption of the Son. (Notes, 1 John 2:20—29.) If therefore any persons came to the place, where this elect lady and her family resided, to propagate their tenets, who brought not with them, in their profession and preaching, "the doctrine of Christ," respecting his Person, as the incarnate Son of God, and his salvation of his people from guilt and sin: they were warned not to entertain the deceivers in their houses, nor to "wish them good success in the name of the Lord;" for by thus countenancing their ministry, they would partake in the guilt of their evil deeds, and be abetting the destruction of men's souls and the dishonor of God.—(Note, 1 Tim. 5:21,22.)—They might indeed relieve them, or persons of any character or principles, in sickness or distress; or show good will to them in any way, which neither gave, nor appeared to give, any sanction to their pernicious doctrines: but they must stand aloof from them, and protest openly against them, in this respect; that they might prevent their mischievous success as much as possible.—The heretics especially intended, are supposed to be those who denied the real humanity of the divine Word; and explained all that was recorded of his actions and sufferings, as mere delusive appearances. (Note, 1 John 4:1—3.)—Hath not God, &c. (9) 1 John 2:23. 5:12. The latter part of the verse, 1 John 2:23, which is printed in Italics, as of doubtful authority, is here fully confirmed.—"To receive a seducing teacher into their houses, and to have given him suitable accommodations, ... would Unless this be considered as a matter of far inferior consequence!

Note.—The apostle expected much joy and comfort in visiting and conversing with this pious matron and her family, and to be a helper of their joy also; that so their consolation in Christ might be complete. (Marg. Ref. i.)—We know nothing concerning “her elect sister,” who sent salutations to them, to which the apostle joined his hearty Amen. But, it is probable, that some well known and eminent family of believers, residing near to the place where the apostle was at this time, is meant.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

A consistent and fruitful profession of the gospel is the principal honor, even of those few of the noble and exalted of the earth, who are thus distinguished: and that love is most cordial and permanent, which Christians bear to one another “in the truth, and for the sake” of it; for this will dwell in their souls to eternity, and be with them as the source of most perfect felicity.—All, who know and love the gospel, will love such as profess and adorn it; and will pray, that “grace may be with them, even mercy and peace, from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father, in truth and love:” and it greatly rejoices faithful and zealous ministers, to see the honorable of the earth employ their influence, and improve their talents, to promote true religion; to observe them educating their “children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;” and to witness their descendants walking in the truth and obedience of the gospel, as ready to support that good cause while they live, and to bequeath a regard towards it to the succeeding generation.—Some few families of this kind are found among us: may “the Lord bless them more and more, and their children after them;” and raise up many others to copy their example! For, alas, most of the superior orders in the community are rapidly diffusing irreligion, infidelity, and vice, in their extensive circles; and preparing to leave them as a fatal legacy to their posterity!—We should employ every argument and persuasion, to induce Christians to abound in love of their brethren, and to render obedience to all the Lord’s commandments: for those “many deceivers, who confess not, that Jesus Christ,” the Son of God, “is come in the flesh,” “to redeem us to God with his blood,” will have great success among such professed Christians, as are not “rooted and grounded in love,” and taught to delight in God’s commandments.

As such deceivers and antichrists multiply on every side, it behoves us “to look to ourselves” and to each other; especially ministers to their people, and parents to their children; “that we may not lose the things which we have wrought, but receive a full reward.” Let us then equally disregard those, who “transgress the commandments,” and those, who “abide not in the doctrine of Christ;” that, by maintaining and obeying the truth, we may “have both the Father and the Son,” for our “Shield and exceeding great Reward.” Let us protest against such teachers, as do not bring with them “the doctrine of Christ;” not giving them any entertainment, and not seeming to “wish them God speed;” lest any should by our means be induced to hearken to their “damnable heresies,” and so we should be found “partakers of their evil deeds;” which, though little suspected, are often a thousand times more mischievous to mankind, than those of profligates, or even assassins; as they murder far more souls of men, than the others can do bodies.—In obeying this commandment of God, amidst the clamors which will be raised against our bigotry and uncharitableness, we should be careful to show great candor to those, who differ from us in matters less essential, who hold the doctrine of Christ’s Person, atonement, and holy salvation: and we ought to pray for those deluded men, who deny the fundamentals of Christianity; and show them kindness, in every way, and by every method, which implies no degree or kind of countenance to their heresies, and which consists with an open and decided protest against them. Thus we shall stand at a distance from all appearance of persecution and intolerance, while we strenuously assert the difference between the gospel of Christ, and the doctrine of every antichrist; and between the love due to enemies, and that which belongs to the saints, in communion with whom we find much of our present joy, as an anticipation of our eternal felicity.

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN.

THE writer of this epistle speaks with an authority, which the bishop of a particular church 'could not pretend to.—For if Diotrephes was bishop of one of the churches of Asia; the 'bishop of Ephesus' (that is, if not an apostle also), 'had no right to say to him, "If I came, I will remember his deeds which he does." (Note, 9,10.) That language, and the visit made to the churches, denote a man who had a more general jurisdiction, than that of a bishop, 'and can only suit St. John the apostle.' Beausobre, and L'Enfant, in Macknight.—All inquiries, whether Gaius, to whom the epistle is addressed, was, or was not, the same person mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the epistles of St. Paul, have hitherto terminated in uncertainty. (Note, 1—4.) There can be no reasonable doubt, that "the strangers," and those "who for his name's sake went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles," were evangelists, or missionaries. (Note, 5—8.)

A. D. 90.

A. D. 90.

The apostle addresses Gaius, with good wishes, commendations, and exhortations to persevere, in his liberal and zealous support of those who went forth to preach the gospel, 1—8. He cautions him against the presumptuous and malicious designs of Diotrephes; and highly commends Demetrius, 9—12. Giving intimations of an intended visit, he concludes with salutations, 13, 14.

2 Beloved, I † wish <sup>d</sup> above all things <sup>e</sup> that thou mayest prosper and be in health, <sup>f</sup> even as thy soul prospereth.

4 I have no greater joy than to hear that <sup>k</sup> my children <sup>l</sup> walk in truth.

Note.—It has been generally supposed, that the Gaius, to whom St. John wrote, was the same person, of whom frequent mention is made in the writings and history of Paul; (Marg. Ref. b.—Note, Rom. 16:21—23.) and his character may seem to favor the opinion: but it is probable that John wrote his epistle many years after St. Paul's death. Gaius was a very common name; and the person here addressed appears to have been converted by John's ministry: so that no certainty can be attached to the opinion; nor is it of any consequence.—After an address, couched in that affectionate and fervent language for which the apostle was remarkable, he added his earnest wish "that concerning all things" (for that seems to be the proper rendering,) "Gaius might prosper; and that he might be in health, even as his soul prospered." Gaius was probably of a weak constitution, and had perhaps sustained heavy losses from the cruel rapacity of persecutors; while at the same time "his soul prospered" exceedingly, as the apostle well knew. He therefore earnestly desired the confirmation of his health, that his valuable life might be prolonged; and that all his well formed designs for usefulness might be prospered, and his ability for conducting them continued and increased. For the apostle had been greatly rejoiced, when certain brethren, (who seem to have been preachers of the gospel,) had come from the residence of Gaius, "and had testified of the truth that was in him;" and of the consistency of his character and conduct, with the truths which he had received and professed. The apostle indeed had no greater joy on earth amidst all his labors, infirmities, and sufferings "than to hear that his children," (either Christians in general, or such as had been converted by his ministry,) "walked in truth;" or when adhering steadfastly to the truths of the gospel they showed the sincerity of their profession, by the effect of the truth on their temper and conduct: for this would doubtless encourage his prayers, and hope in God, and animate him to more fervent thanksgivings. Indeed it must have highly gratified the zeal and benevolence of his pious heart. (Notes, Philem. 4—7. 2 John 1—4.)

8 We therefore ought to receive such, that we might be <sup>s</sup> fellow-helpers to the truth.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle thought it proper to commend his beloved Gaius, as one who in all things acted in that manner which became a believer, and was faithful in the use of what had been committed to his stewardship. (Notes, Luke 16:1—8. 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) This appeared in whatever he did towards his fellow Christians, and the ministers of the gospel: and to the strangers, who were driven from home by persecution, or who travelled abroad to preach the word of God. For these had “borne testimony” to his liberal and hospitable love, before the churches of Christ, in different places, especially where St. John then resided: and in continuing to entertain such persons, and in aiding to defray their expenses, from a regard to the will and glory of God, he would act in a manner becoming his character, and honorable to the gospel. Because, from love to Christ, and for the honor of his name, they had gone forth, as evangelists, leaving their native country, friends, connexions, occupations, and temporal prospects, to preach among the Gentiles: determining to take nothing of them for their subsistence, to whatever straits they might be reduced, lest they should appear mercenary, and so prejudice the minds of men against their doctrine. (Notes, 2 Kings 5:15, 16, 20—27. Acts 20:32—35. 1 Cor. 9:7—23. 2 Cor. 11:7—12. 1 Thes. 2:9—12. 2 Thes. 3:6—9.) It therefore became the duty of established Christians, to entertain such zealous and disinterested ministers and missionaries, and to contribute to their support: that they might be “helpers together with them,” in propagating the truth of the gospel, by enabling them to proceed in their work and labor of love.—The apostle’s sentiment in this precept is, that such of the brethren as had not devoted themselves to the preaching of the gospel, but followed their ordinary occupations at home, were bound to contribute, according to their ability, towards the maintenance of those who went about preaching the gospel. Macknight. It is manifest, at the first glance, how exactly this accords to the case of those, in this commercial country, who cannot, or do not, become missionaries; and to their conduct respecting those who do.

10 Wherefore, if I come, <sup>y</sup> I will remember his deeds which he doeth, prating against us with malicious words: and not content therewith, neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would, <sup>z</sup> and casteth them out of the church.

11 Beloved, <sup>a</sup> follow not that which is evil, but that which is good. <sup>b</sup> He that doeth good is of God; but <sup>c</sup> he that doeth evil hath not seen God.

12 Demetrius hath <sup>d</sup> good report of all men, and of the truth itself: yea, <sup>e</sup> and we also hear record; and ye know that our record is true.

Note.—Some expositors think, that the apostle here only meant, that he “should have written to the church,” had not the report which he had heard concerning Diotrophes, determined him rather to address his letter to Gaius; but it does not appear how the words can admit of that construction. It seems that he had written to the church, to induce them to help on their journey and assist in a manner becoming their profession the persons before mentioned: (Note, 5—8.) but Diotrophes (probably a pastor of the church, whose circumstances, or abilities, or eloquence, concurring with his ambition of pre-eminence, had acquired for him an undue influence over his brethren,) would not own his authority, or pay any regard to his counsel. Wherefore the apostle observed, that “if he came” thither, as he intended to do shortly, he would publicly censure his conduct, or even enforce his decision by inflicting some miraculous punishment; (Notes, 2 Cor. 10:1—6. 13:1—10.) as Diotrophes was not afraid or ashamed to vent malicious or wicked invectives and slanders against him, in the most indecent manner. Nay, he did not think this a sufficient expression of his contempt and enmity; but he refused to entertain or countenance those evangelists or missionaries, whom the apostle had recommended; and even forbad others to do it; and when they regarded the apostle’s authority more than his prohibition, he proceeded to ex-communicate them for so doing!—It is indeed most wonderful, that a professed minister of Christ should thus pertinaciously oppose the aged apostle; and should acquire such authority over the affairs of any church, as to be supported in the disgraceful contest: yet this was most evidently the case. The apostle, therefore, warned his beloved Gaius, neither to be influenced by this ambitious man, nor to imitate his conduct; let him not “follow the evil, (Notes, 1 John 3:4—10.)—But while the apostle cautioned Gaius against Diotrephes, he pointed out to him another person of his acquaintance, who was well worthy of his imitation; as he had a good report of all Christians, and of men in general; yea, the very truth itself, as it were, bore testimony to his humble diligence, zeal, and honorable conduct: to which the apostle also added his testimony. And Gaius knew this to be true and faithful: he would, therefore, be sure to honor and imitate so excellent a man.—"Private offences against ourselves must be forgiven, and forgotten; but when the offence ... is an impediment to the faith, and very prejudicial to the church, it is to be opposed and openly reproved." Whitby.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

How many professors of the gospel are there, concerning whom the apostle's words may be reversed; so that we must earnestly wish and pray, that "their souls may prosper," as their health and outward circumstances do! For spiritual languor, and want of appetite for the spiritual provisions of the gospel, with every other symptom of disease; attended by want of success and vigor, in every thing conducive to the glory of God, may be observed in numbers to bear proportion to their external prosperity. But there are even in these days a few, who are so eminent in grace, and zealous of good works, that the precarious state of their health gives concern to all who love the gospel: and they earnestly desire the continuance of their lives, and the increase of their ability to do good, and that they may "prosper in all things, even as their souls prosper." The conduct of such Christians gives a joy to faithful ministers, which counterbalances their grief on account of those who disgrace their profession: and every renewed testimony, which is borne to their "walking in the truth," renews that inward satisfaction; for the rejoicing of such pastors over their children, and in their fruitfulness and consolation, differs widely from the selfish joy of prosperous hirelings, or that of such as "love to have the pre-eminence."—Parents and ministers should be as ready to commend what is well done, as to point out what is wrong in the conduct of those, whom they superintend; and indeed this is far more pleasing to a benevolent mind.—The faithful stewards of Christ, whether they have been intrusted with "the mysteries of God," or with talents of another sort, will at length "obtain a good report:" nor can multiplied charities, or "hospitality without grudging" be so concealed, as to remain unknown to the church. (Notes, Matt. 5:13—16. 6:1—4. 1 Tim. 5:24, 25.) Applause properly introduces exhortations and even needful reproofs; (Notes, 1 Cor. 11:2—22.) and indeed it should be considered as an admonition, to proceed in the same commendable behavior.—Ministers and missionaries, who are "constrained by the love of Christ" and of the souls of men, to leave comfortable stations, to rend themselves from beloved relatives, submit to many and great privations, and even that of sweet communion with Christian friends, and abundant "means of grace," to go forth and encounter perils and hardships in spreading the gospel; and who are content to struggle with poverty in "their labor of love," rather than quit their stations, or do any thing to prevent their own success; are peculiarly entitled to the countenance and assistance of their fellow Christians. Every one, according to his ability, ought to assist such persons, as circumstances require; that "they may be fellow-helpers to the truth;" not as a matter of choice, or as if giving an alms; but as the performance of an incumbent duty, the payment of a debt, the return of gratitude due, not only to God, but to those missionaries, who first, by such exertions and privations, brought the gospel into our land; and "who being dead yet speak," and say, "Go and do likewise." Indeed that money must be well expended, which promotes the faithful preaching of the gospel, in any part of the world; and it is greatly to be wished, that all Christians would try to save, not only a little, but, if practicable, very much, from their expenses, in order to create a fund for conducting such important designs.

V. 9—14.

Alas! we live too much to ourselves, if these lukewarm days: and we need not wonder, if covetous and ambitious men, who "love to have the pre-eminence" in the church, disdain admonitions from inferior ministers; when even the apostles were not secured from the presumptuous, insolent, and malicious opposition of persons of this description: but their deeds will one day be remembered against them; when "every one that exalteth himself shall be abased, and he who humbleth himself shall be exalted." Let us then not follow that which is proud, selfish, malicious, slanderous, and wicked; though the example be given by eminent, and distinguished, or accomplished persons; but let us be "followers of God, as dear children, and walk in love," after the example of our Lord, and such as have most closely imitated him: for he, who thus habitually "doeth good, is of God;" and he "that doeth evil hath not seen or known God," whatever his notions or gifts may be. We should therefore notice those, "who by well-doing have put to silence the ignorance of foolish men," and who have good "report of the truth itself," and of its most faithful and zealous friends: for by associating with such Christians, and copying their example, we shall have peace within, and live at peace with the brethren. Thus our communications with the Lord's people on earth will be very pleasant, and we shall at length be 'numbered with them in glory everlasting.'

THE EPISTLE GENERAL OF JUDE.

THE writer of this epistle so expressly describes himself, as Jude, the brother of James, (Marg. Ref. a. 1.) that we must either allow him to have been Jude the apostle, called also Lebbeus, whose surname was Thaddeus, who was brother, or near relation, to our Lord; (Note, Matt. 10:1—4.) or we must suppose the writer guilty of a direct forgery. Some hesitation, however, as to the authenticity of the epistle, seems for a time to have prevailed in the church, which was at length fully removed; though some learned moderns have, on frivolous pretences, as they appear to me, endeavored to revive it.—He calls himself, not an apostle, "but a servant of Jesus Christ;" and so does St. Paul. (Phil. 1:1.) He is also supposed to quote apocryphal books: but did not St. Paul quote heathen poets, and Jewish traditions, when what was true in them might be adduced to good purpose without at all sanctioning the fables which they contained? (Notes, Acts 17:26—29. 2 Tim. 3:6—9. Tit. 1:10—13.) These are the chief objections; and they amount to nothing against the internal evidence, and the general current of antiquity. It is probable that Jude wrote to caution his brethren against the same deceivers, whom Peter, in his second epistle, had opposed; and nearly at the same time.—Many think, that they both had access to some ancient book, which is now lost, and that they quoted from it; and likewise, that Jude had seen St. Peter's epistle; and, in order to add his testimony to the same effect, adopted several of his thoughts, and even expressions. This, however, is uncertain: for the same "Spirit of prophecy" might lead these two witnesses to oppose the corrupters of Christianity, by similar examples, arguments, and illustrations; without either of them knowing what the other wrote.—There is no ground for the opinion, that it was exclusively addressed to the Jewish converts: on the contrary, it seems to have been properly a catholic epistle, intended for all Christian churches throughout the world. The exact time when, and the place from which, it was written, are wholly uncertain.

A. D. 70.

The address and salutation; and the writer's purpose in the epistle, namely, to establish Christians against certain false teachers, who were men of a very bad character, and to excite them to "coolend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints," 1—4. The example of the Israelites who perished in the wilderness, that of fallen angels, and that of Sodom, are adduced, as showing the danger to which those who apo-tatized, or perverted the gospel, were exposed. 5—7. The vile character of these seducers further shown, and their doom denounced; with reference to some traditions, concerning Michael, contending with the devil about the body of Moses; and an ancient prediction delivered by Enoch, concerning the "day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men," 8—16. Warnings, counsels, and exhortations suited to the occasion; and a concluding ascription of glory to "the only wise God our Saviour," 17—25.

Note.—The apostle Jude, or Judas, (John 14:22.) seems to have written this short circular letter, soon after Peter wrote his second epistle; with an intention of adding his protest also against the seducers whom Peter opposed. He styled himself "the servant of Jesus Christ, and the brother of James," namely of James the Less, the son of Alphaeus, who was the author of the epistle bearing that name. (Preface to James.)—The unusual ascription of "sanctification to God the Father," and the arrangement of the sentence, have induced many expositors to explain "sanctified," of Christians having been "set apart," or separated "in the election of grace," by "God the Father;" in consequence of which they were "given to Jesus Christ," and preserved in and by him, from dying in their sins, or falling into fatal delusions, till called, by the word and Spirit of God, into a state of actual fellowship in the gospel of Christ. Others suppose the order of the words to have been disregarded: and then the apostle's meaning is, that the persons addressed were regenerated and sanctified, by the grace communicated from God the Father; that they were thus brought home to the "good Shepherd, who bought them with his blood," and were preserved by his watchful care; and, being "called according to his purpose," they would be "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation." (Note, 1 Pet. 1:3-5.)—In behalf of all these the apostle desired, that "mercy," to pardon their sins, to compassionate and relieve their miseries, and to supply their wants; "and peace," inward and outward; "and love, might be multiplied unto them:" even the special love of God to them with all its precious fruits, and their love to him, to one another, and to all men for his sake. 3 Beloved, <sup>ε</sup>when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the <sup>h</sup>common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you, <sup>i</sup>that ye should earnestly contend for the faith <sup>k</sup>which was once delivered unto <sup>l</sup>the saints.

Note.—When the apostle applied himself, with all assiduity and care, to write to his fellow Christians, concerning that salvation, which was common to him and them, and to every man who would accept of it; it appeared to him, on mature consideration, most needful to address them upon the duty of "contending earnestly for the faith," or doctrine, "once delivered to the saints," by the apostles and evangelists, who first preached the gospel after the day of Pentecost. They could not but know the great fundamentals of that doctrine, respecting the Person and salvation of the Lord Jesus, and his mediatorial authority over his redeemed subjects, and "as head over all," for their benefit. And, as these were violently assaulted, they ought to "contend earnestly" for them; patiently and constantly professing the faith, and adhering to the commands of Christ, in the midst of hardships and persecution. They should diligently endeavor, notwithstanding all kinds of opposition, to disseminate the knowledge of uncorrupted Christianity in the world; refusing all countenance to those who opposed it: decidedly using all their influence to put others upon their guard, and to confirm them in the faith and practice of the gospel; and to show them the falsehood and pernicious tendency of the heresies, which were propagated instead of them. Thus their example, profession, conversation, prayers, and improvement of talents, might be instrumental to stop the progress of fatal delusions: to establish the faith of the weak and wavering; and even to recover some of the fallen. And an earnest "contending for the faith," with such weapons as these, would consist with meekness and benevolence; differing widely from that controversy, which has too often been conducted with acrimony, slander, invective, and reciprocal contempt. (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1-6.) These vigorous measures were peculiarly proper at that time, as certain men had glided in like serpents, with subtlety and plausible pretences, "unawares" to the people and their pastors: (for the enemy sows these tares, while men sleep;) but the Lord had foreseen them; for they "were of old ordained," or registered, "to this condemnation." Many predictions had from the beginning been delivered to this effect; (Note, 14-16.) and it had been declared, that persons of this character should arise, to invent and propagate pernicious errors; deceiving men, and exposing themselves to the righteous condemnation denounced against lying prophets. Nay, these predictions had been extracts, as it were, from the registers in heaven; even the secret and eternal decrees of God, "known unto whom are his works from the beginning of the world." Such were "ungodly men," who, professing Christianity, took encouragement from the abundant mercy of God, and the way of gratuitous salvation there revealed, to indulge without fear or shame in the grossest "lasciviousness;" thus perverting the most holy truths into an occasion to the vilest unholiness! (Notes, Rom. 6:1,2. Gal. 5:13-15.) In doing this they "denied the only Lord God," cast off the yoke of his authority, as their Creator, and that of "our Lord Jesus Christ;" by refusing to have him to rule over them, or to be the subjects of his mediatorial kingdom. (Note, 2 Pet. 2:1-3.)—Some have supposed, that these ungodly men denied the doctrine of the apostles, concerning the Person and atonement of Christ; (Notes, 1 John 2:18-25.) and they therefore explain "turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness," of some attempts made by them to traduce the doctrines of grace, as tending to licentiousness. But this construction is very unnatural: and the whole epistle shows that they were abominable antinomians, who "wrought all uncleanness with greediness," under pretence of exalting free grace. It is, however, very probable, that they also held some wild notions concerning the Person of Christ; for this was generally the case, with the various descriptions of these primitive heretics; whose absurd and presumptuous speculations, concerning these mysterious subjects, would be wholly unworthy our notice, did they not illustrate the folly of man's wisdom, in matters of religion; the perverse disposition of the human heart to prefer any senseless falsehood to the truths of revelation; and the artifice of Satan in suiting the delusions, which he propagates by his ministers, to the taste and capacities of those whom he means to ruin by them. This shows what their sentiments were on this subject: but it is not clear, that the decree was here meant, except as connected with the prophetic description. At least, it is not meant, that they were "ordained" to commit these crimes, by any constraint: but merely that their wilful sin and impotence being foreseen, and God for wise reasons determining to leave them to themselves, he "ordained them to this condemnation;" as he had done Judas, and those who crucified Christ. (*Notes, Matt. 26:21—24. 8 Likewise also, <sup>d</sup> these filthy dreamers <sup>e</sup> defile the flesh, <sup>f</sup> despise dominion, <sup>g</sup> and speak evil of dignities. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—(Notes, 1 Cor. 10:1—12. 2 Pet. 2:4—9,20—22.) External privileges, profession, and apparent conversion, could not secure from the severest vengeance of God, those who turned aside from him in unbelief and disobedience. To evince this, the apostle deemed it proper to remind his readers, though they had been taught, and had once understood it, (Note, 2 Pet. 1:12—15.) that the Lord, having delivered the whole nation of Israel from Egyptian bondage, and having made a covenant with them as his people; yet afterwards destroyed, with terrible judgments, such of them "as believed not," and so would not obey him; though this judgment involved a vast majority of the nation. (Notes, Ex. 19:3. 24:1—11. Heb. 3:7—19. 4:1,2.) In like manner, those who apostatized from Christianity, or manifested their unbelief by determined and habitual disobedience; instead of being secured by external privileges, would be more deeply condemned on account of them. Even the angels, originally created holy, endued with noble powers, and exalted to great eminence in heaven itself; when, dissatisfied with "their first estate," they, ambitiously and rebelliously, left the station assigned them by the Creator, had been "cast down" from their holy habitation, and were "reserved," as "in everlasting chains of darkness," wickedness, misery, and despair, "unto the judgment of the great day;" when their condemnation will be as distinguished, as the rank was from which they fell. In like manner, the inhabitants of Sodom and the adjacent cities, who were favored with a most pleasant and fruitful country, and with great prosperity; when, after the manner of apostate angels, they daringly rebelled against God, (which appeared especially in their giving up themselves to abandoned lewdness, and the shameless indulgence of their unnatural lusts,) had been exhibited as "an example" of divine vengeance to the whole earth, in the destruction of their cities, and all that was in them, by

10 But these <sup>n</sup> speak evil of those things which they know not: but what they know naturally, as brute beasts, <sup>o</sup> in those things they corrupt themselves.

Note.—(Notes, 2 Pet. 2:10—17.) It is most probable, that the apostle took this account concerning Michael, from an ancient tradition which was well known among the Jews; and by thus adducing it, he has given an attestation to its truth. (Notes, Deut. 34:6. Dan. 10:10—14,20,21. 12:1.) In Daniel, Michael has been supposed to be the Son of God himself, as the great Ruler over all angels, and worshipped by them all. Yet we do not seem authorized to interpret this text of the Son of God, as spoken of in the tradition by the name of Michael; but rather of some created angel, invested with great authority over his fellows, perhaps as Messiah’s peculiar vicegerent. (Note, 1 Thes. 4:13—18.)—This exalted archangel, however, had a contest with the devil about the body of Moses. It may be supposed that Satan aimed to make the place of his burial known to the Israelites, in order to tempt them to worship him; as the papists do the bodies of martyrs, real or supposed: but Michael would not suffer him to do it; and probably the devil expressed his rage in desperate blasphemy. Yet Michael “durst not bring against him a railing accusation;” he did not presume to denounce on him the judgment of blasphemy, or to retort his revilings; but merely said to him, “The Lord rebuke thee.” (Zech. 3:2.) Though the hateful character and atrocious conduct of the devil must have excited the holy abhorrence and indignation of the archangel; he yet dared not to utter any reviling expression: not from fear of the devil; but because, even in those circumstances, it would not have been consistent with the perfection of his character. Yet the heretics, of whom Jude was speaking, claimed superior eminence, as the favorites of heaven, and dared to “speak evil of dignities,” whom God had commanded them to honor and obey. Thus they spoke language concerning princes and rulers, which Michael scrupled to use concerning the devil himself: and surely they would not maintain, that they were more privileged than the archangel! or that their rulers were more execrable than that great enemy of God and man! But indeed they “spake evil of such things as they understood not:” for they were men of a base grovelling mind; whose chief attention was paid to the indulgence of their appetites, in such things as “they knew naturally,” even like the brutes; and by their excessive and lawless gratification they wholly polluted themselves.—To suppose, as some learned men have done, that “the body of Moses,” means the Jewish church after the captivity: because the true church is called “the body of Christ,” and to refer the whole to the transaction recorded in the third of Zechariah, merely because “the Lord rebuke thee, Satan,” occurs there, may be ingenious; but it is ingenious trifling, which brings no instruction nor satisfaction to the mind. (Note, Zech. 3:1—4.)—Michael, one of the principal angels, was contented to deliver up the devil, however execrable, to be corrected by the judgment of God: yet these perverse and insignificant men, were not ashamed to reproach “the powers, ordained by God” ‘himself?’ Beza.—‘The angels have no disposition, and I believe, they have no talent, or faculty, for railing: the cool consideration whereof should make all men, especially those who call themselves divines, and especially in controversies about religion, ashamed and afraid of this manner of disputing.’ *Arbp. 11 <sup>p</sup> Woe unto them! <sup>q</sup> for they have gone in the way of Cain, <sup>r</sup> and ran greedily after the error of Balaam for reward, and <sup>s</sup> perished in the gainsaying of Core.

Note.—The apostle denounced a dreadful woe upon these deceivers: for they had “gone in the way of Cain;” who, proudly disliking the humble obedience of faith, and the spiritual worship which God had appointed, failed of finding acceptance with him: and, being enraged by this, he murdered his righteous brother, and apostatized from the religion which he had professed. (Notes, Gen. 4:1—17. 1 John 3:13—15.) In like manner, these wicked men had turned aside from the pure doctrine of Christ, become haters of those who adhered to it, and were about to cast off all profession of Christianity.—They had also run with eagerness and greediness in the same way, which Balaam had taken, in order to obtain “the reward of unrighteousness:” like him they had gone contrary to the commandment of the Lord, from “love to filthy lucre;” they had sought the ruin of Ἰερωνᾶς’s worshippers, and they had seduced many of them into licentiousness, and thus exposed them to divine vengeance. (Notes, 2 Pet. 2:15,16. Rev. 2:14—16.)—Moreover, as “Korah and his company” had contradicted and opposed the authority of Moses and Aaron, and excited the people to rebel against them; so those wicked men had rejected the authority of Christ’s apostles, and contradicted their doctrine: yea, they had induced many others to oppose them; and they were about to perish in their gainsaying, or rebellion, as Korah and his associates did. (Notes, Num. 16.) These were “spots in their religious feasts,” in which they met together as Christian brethren; for, feasting with Christians, and indulging their appetites without fear, they would, by that and other scandalous practices, become a disgrace to the whole company. They were indeed “clouds without water,” from whom no good could be expected; whilst their own lusts, and Satan’s temptation, drove them from one folly and wickedness to another, as the clouds are driven about by the wind. (Note, Eph. 4:14—16.) They might also be compared to trees, which seem <sup>g</sup> to take root and to give hopes of fruit; but their buddings were withered, and they remained wholly unfruitful: so that they were “twice dead;” as the transient hope which had been given, of receiving life and taking root, only made way for their being reduced to a more desperate state, from which they could not be expected to recover: for they were as barren trees torn up by the roots, that they might be cast into the fire. (Notes, Matt. 3:7—10. 2 Pet. 2:18—22.) They might also be compared to “raging waves of the sea,” in the turbulency, clamor, and violence of their conduct; whilst, by boasting, reviling, and filthy language, they “foamed out their own shame;” and proved to all, who judged by the word of God, what scandalous and abominable characters they were. They were like “wandering stars,” whose irregular courses could not easily be described or understood; whilst their appearance, though luminous, foreboded mischief to mankind: and “the blackness of darkness,” despair, and misery, were reserved for their eternal portion; along “with the devil and his angels,” with whom they had united in opposing the authority and honor of Christ.—The word, rendered spots, primarily means the tops of the rocks, appearing above the water, which give the sea the appearance of being spotted, and on which ships are wrecked. Thus the disgraceful appearance of these heretics, and the danger arising from them, may be at once exhibited.—The word, rendered “wandering stars,” signifies planets: but it may be questioned, whether the apostle used it in the strict astronomical sense; or not rather, according to the popular meaning of it, which best suited his purpose.—The horrible enormities, ascribed to the heretics who are supposed to be here intended, are almost incredible; but, if true, it is by no means proper to speak of them in the detail.

mouth speaketh great swelling words, <sup>r</sup> having men's persons in admiration, because of advantage.

Note.—In a prophecy, delivered by Enoch to the Antediluvians, concerning the coming of the Lord to judgment, men of this character had been predicted and condemned. This ancient prophecy, however, had not been committed to writing, either by Moses, or by any other inspired person; but it had been preserved by tradition, and accorded to the general doctrine of revelation: and it was authenticated, as a part of it, when thus quoted by the apostle of Christ. Enoch, though he lived so soon after the creation, as to be the seventh in descent from Adam; (Notes, Gen. 5:21—24. Heb. 11:5,6.) yet foresaw and predicted the second coming of the Lord, even of the promised Messiah, to judge the world; of which the approaching deluge was an emblem. (Note, Job 19:23—27.) He, therefore, called on the men of that abandoned generation, to “behold” and take notice, that the Lord would come, and was even then coming, with “ten thousands of his holy ones,” his holy angels, in the most conspicuous manner. (Notes, Matt. 25:31—33. 2 Thes. 1:5—10.)—Then he would “execute judgment upon all” men: and arraign, convict, and condemn all that were ungodly among them, both in respect of their profane, rebellious, and wicked works, which they had most impiously perpetrated, in contempt and defiance of him; and of all the hard speeches, the virulent, presumptuous, scornful blasphemous, and malicious words, which they had dared to utter, from the proud and carnal enmity of their hearts against him. (Note, Jam. 3:3—6.) This conviction and condemnation the false teachers, of whom Jude wrote, could not escape; seeing their works and words were exactly of the same kind. For they were “murmurers;” (after the example of the Israelites, who murmured against Moses and Aaron, and thus showed their enmity to JEHOVAH;) they quarrelled with the truth, precepts, and ministers of Christ; (Note, Rom. 2:7—11.) and “complainers” who were dissatisfied with every restraint laid on them, or authority exercised over them; and also expressed continual discontent with the Lord’s providential dispensations respecting them. At the same time, they “walked after their own lusts,” habitually making their unconvertible carnal inclinations the rule of their conduct, and disdain all control. Yet “their mouths spake great swelling words;” boasting extravagantly of their knowledge, liberty, and gifts, as if they were the only favorites of heaven: and they paid court, with abundant flatteries and professed admiration, to such persons, as were able and willing to promote their secular advantages, without any regard to their characters; by which partiality, and mercenary servility, they attached proud and worldly men to their party. (Note, 2 Pet. 2:18,19.)

17 But, beloved, <sup>a</sup> remember ye the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ;

Note.—(Note, 2 Pet. 3:1—4.) As the deceivers, of whom the sacred writer spoke, were making destructive progress in the church; he deemed it requisite to exhort his beloved brethren, to recollect the words which the other apostles of Christ had spoken, when they first preached the gospel to them; (Notes, 1, 2. 2 Pet. 3:1—4. 1 John 4:4—6.) as well as what some of them had written to this effect, especially Paul, Peter, and James. For they had warned them, that under the Christian dispensation there would arise, within the visible church, “mockers,” who would treat the most sacred truths, and most important duties of Christianity with profane contempt; and would be a scandal to that holy religion, by “walking after their own ungodly lusts.” (Notes, 2 Tim. 3:1—9. 4:1—5. 2 Pet. 3:1—4.) These warnings and predictions related to those persons, who at that time separated from the apostolical churches, to form heretical sects; being “sensual,” or natural, unregenerate men, who, “not having the Spirit” of God dwelling in them, as the Author and Preserver of divine life and holy affections, were entirely actuated by pride, ambition, avarice, malignant, and licentious inclinations. It therefore behoved the disciples of Christ to remember their Lord’s admonition on this subject, “By their fruits ye shall know them.” (Note, Matt. 7:15—20.)

(Notes, 1 Cor. 2:14—16. Jam. 3:13—16.) It is absurd to suppose, that the apostle would class with these abominable heretics, all those professed Christians who had not the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit: and if that interpretation be set aside, as inadmissible, “not having the Spirit" must mean being unregenerate, not having the Holy Spirit as a Sanctifier. (Notes, Rom. 8:5—11.)—It should be observed, that Jude, as well as Peter and John, appeals to the "word of the apostles," as the standard according to which all ought to be regulated: but this word of the apostles can be found in their writings only.

Note.—Instead of listening to the deceivers, the apostle exhorted his beloved brethren to employ themselves in "building up themselves" and each other, "on their most holy faith."—The doctrine of faith is "most holy" in its nature and tendency; leading men to repent, and hate all sin; to love and obey God; and to lead a sober, righteous, and godly life; by which it may be distinguished from all false doctrines. The grace of faith "is most holy;" as it "worketh by love," "purifieth the heart," and "overcometh the world," by which it is distinguishable from a false and dead faith. Adhering, therefore, to the holy doctrine of the gospel by a living obedient faith; Christians ought continually to be seeking an increase in knowledge of the truths of God, and in the experience of the power of them on their hearts; that they may be more and more established, in a realizing and efficacious belief of them, and in all those holy dispositions, and that obedient practice, which depend on it, as the superstructure rests upon the foundation. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:10—15. Eph. 2:19—22.) Thus the consistency, stability, and circumspection of their conduct will continually be advancing; and they will more effectually "adorn the gospel," glorify God, and do good to men, as long as they live. In order, "to build up themselves" and each other, "on their most holy faith," the apostle directed them to continue "praying in the Holy Ghost," or in dependence on his sacred teaching, and under the influence of it; (Notes, Zech. 12:9—14. Rom. 8:24—27. Eph. 6:18—20.) as in this manner alone they could escape the snares and resist the temptations which would be laid in their way. By such a conduct they ought "to keep themselves in the love of God;" in the assurance and comfort of his special love to them, which they could not enjoy if they were slothful; and in the exercise of filial love and gratitude towards him. (Notes, John 15:9—11. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) Yet, with all this assiduity, watchfulness, devotion, and conscientiousness, they must put no trust in themselves, or their own works: but wait, expect, and be continually "looking for the mercy," shown to sinners, by the Lord Jesus Christ; and preparing for the completion of it, in "eternal life," as the gift of God through him. (Note, Gal. 5:1—6.)—Certainly, "praying in the Holy Ghost" does not mean extemporaneous prayer, as distinguished from a liturgy: for both those who pray without a form, and those who read words previously put together, often come short of "praying by the Holy Spirit." But how is the whole of this most beautiful passage enervated, by explaining the words in question, of inspiration, or miraculous gifts! Whether with a written form, or without, no man can pray spiritually, except by the teaching and assistance of the Holy Spirit, exciting, in the mind and heart, holy desires, affections, and expectations: and this is wholly independent of miracles, and of inspiration properly so called. All Christians are commanded to pray in, or "by, the Holy Spirit:" but, for at least fifteen hundred years, no Christians have had the Spirit of miracles and inspiration. Have none then, during this period, prayed according to the exhortation of the apostles and prophets? (Note, John 4:21—24.)

Note.—It was peculiarly needful for Christians, in those perilous times, to know how to act respecting such of their brethren, as had been seduced by the deceivers above described; and who might probably be recovered. (Notes, Gal. 6:1—5. Jam. 5:19, 20. 1 John 5:16—18.) Of some they ought to "have compassion," and to treat them with gentleness, tenderness, and kindness; "making a difference," between those who had fallen through inadvertency, and appeared penitent; and others who were more hardened and profane. The latter they were directed "to save with fear;" being cautious, lest by attempting their recovery, they should be themselves entangled; as if a man, being eager to rescue others from a fire, should fall in and be himself burned: or, they ought to use alarming and terrifying methods; as men would do, if they saw any persons in imminent danger of being consumed in the flames, while insensible of their situation, through sleep or intoxication. All endeavors, in this case, must especially be joined with decided abhorrence of the crimes committed by the persons concerned; and care to avoid whatever led to "fellowship with them, in their works of darkness:" even as a garment infected with the plague would be cautiously shunned by those, who desired to keep clear of that most destructive malady; or, as the Jews would fear to touch a garment, which might convey ceremonial uncleanness. Thus ought they to "hate even the garment spotted with the flesh;" or whatever had the most remote alliance with the sensual practices and licentious doctrines of these deceivers. (Note, Eph. 5:8—14.)—It has been observed by some writers, that such ornamental or improper clothing, as serves to tempt others to sinful inclinations or practices, or is purchased with the wages of licentiousness, may very properly be called "garments spotted with the flesh;" and, as such, however rich, elegant, or becoming, it ought to be detested and loathed, more than the meanest rags, by all those who would be thought Christians.—But, whilst the apostle gave these warnings and counsels, he showed his readers where to place their whole dependence for preservation, by the form of his concluding doxology. For he addressed it "to him, who was able to keep them from falling," into iniquity, heresy, or destruction, whatever their dangers and temptations might be; and who alone could do it, by his outward protection and his inward supports; and thus, at length, "to present them faultless," fully justified, and perfected in holiness, "before the presence of his glory," when displayed at the day of judgment before the assembled world; "with exceeding joy," to each of them on his own account, and in the felicity of all the rest; to all the holy angels, yea, to the Lord himself, who will "rejoice over them to do them good" for ever. (Notes, Acts 20:32—35. Rom. 16:25—27. 2 Cor. 11:1—6. Eph. 5:22—27.) To him, therefore, as "the only wise God," who "knew how to deliver the godly out of temptation," even to "God our Saviour," the apostle ascribed "glory and majesty, dominion and power, both then and for ever. Amen." (Note, 1, 2.) He rejoiced that all glory and dominion belonged to him, and would for ever be possessed by him, who alone was worthy of them, and capable of exercising them in a suitable manner, for the good of his universal and everlasting kingdom.—As the Lord Jesus alone will visibly appear at the day of judgment, to "present his saints" unto himself; it has been thought by some expositors that this doxology was addressed personally to him. (Marg. Ref.) But others suppose, that the apostle had the "One true and living God" in his mind, without exclusive respect to any of the persons in the sacred Trinity: as "God is become our Saviour," in Jesus Christ; and the glory "of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," in the salvation of believers, will be displayed at the day of judgment; though Christ alone will, visibly and personally, appear to judge the world. (Notes, 1 Tim. 1:17. Rev. 5:9—14. 7:9—12.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

When the servants of Christ address those, who "are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called;" and for whom they pray, "that mercy, peace, and love may be multiplied unto them;" they must not only instruct them, "with all diligence," in things pertaining to "the common salvation," but select such subjects as more especially suit the circumstances of the times, and tend to put them on their guard against prevailing delusions.—A cordial attachment to the doctrines "once delivered to the saints," and handed down to us in the scriptures, will render us "earnest in contending for them," and against all innovations, by every means consistent with meekness and love: and a competent acquaintance with them, will put us upon our guard against those "ungodly men, who creep in unawares," amidst revivals of religion, and "turn the grace of God into lasciviousness," by their perverse interpretations and scandalous crimes; through which they "deny the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ," as if they were determined to be their own rulers in every sense, and to be subject to no authority, either human or divine. Thus they bring upon themselves that destruction, which is appointed in scripture to men of this character.—Whilst we "contend earnestly" for the truths which relate to the Person and Salvation of Christ, we should guard with equal caution against every perversion of them: for, though the infidel or the Pharisee will as surely come short of salvation, as the Antinomian; yet he does not so immediately dishonor the gospel, or in general do so much to set mankind against it. We ought therefore to remind the people not to rest in any profession, knowledge, or experience, which does not bring the soul into subjection "to the obedience of Christ." (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) for nothing, but the renewal of our souls to the divine image, by the Holy Spirit, can secure us from being destroyed among the enemies of God. We are continually warned of this: and the examples of his severity on unbelieving Israelites, on apostate angels, and on Sodom and Gomorrah, stand on record for our admonition; that we should not presume on former favors and present privileges, or take occasion from thence to rebel, or to indulge our ungodly lusts, if we also would not be "bound in chains of darkness unto the judgment of the great day."

V. 9—16.

Whilst we are on our guard against "filthy dreamers, who defile the flesh:" let us also stand aloof from those, whether moral or immoral in other respects, "who despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities," and give themselves the license to revile their rulers, in language which an archangel would not venture to use, in reply to the blasphemies of the prince of darkness! When we deem any thing amiss in the conduct of our governors, and wish well to sober, and regular, and peaceable plans of securing liberty, and redressing grievances; let us by no means lose sight of "the meekness of wisdom," but leave every matter to the Lord in the use of proper means. Nay, even if oppressed and persecuted, we should, without "rendering evil for evil," "commit ourselves to him that judgeth righteously."—There always have been numbers who "speak evil of things, which they do not understand," and corrupt themselves in such things as they "know naturally like brute beasts." The way of Cain, of Balaam, and of Korah, has, in every age and place, been frequented: and enmity against God, concurring with avarice, ambition, and sensuality, drives men headlong in similar courses to their own destruction. But when persons of this character are continued in communion with the churches of Christ, they are disgraceful "spots" and blemishes in them: whilst they indulge their appetites and passions without fear or shame; and bear no good fruit, but disappoint all the expectations, which promising appearances at any time excited. Such persons, remaining unfruitful after convictions, and under high professions, and so becoming "twice dead, and plucked up by the roots;" often prove like "raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame," in virulent reproaches, arrogant boastings, and perhaps horrible blasphemies: they make a glare indeed for a short time, like meteors, and then they sink "into the blackness of darkness for ever." The "men of God," from the beginning of the world, have declared the doom, which will be denounced on all such persons, when Christ shall come "with ten thousands of his saints, to execute judgment on all the ungodly," for all their wicked works, and for all the impious words, which they have spoken against him, by reviling his truths, servants, providential appointments, righteous decrees, and holy commandments. We should therefore avoid those "murmurers and complainers, who walk after their ungodly lusts," and want a religion to suit such a course of life: and we ought to disregard their "great swelling words of vanity;" whilst we mark, how they have "men's persons in admiration" for their own secular advantage; especially such as are rich, and can afford to purchase at a high rate, flattery, authority, and influence in the visible church.

We should constantly "remember the words of the apostles of Christ:" and we shall find the scriptures verified in the profane and licentious scoffers, who separate from those that adhere to the holy doctrine of Christ, and even dare to deride them; and who expect, that the Lord will save them, though they remain carnal, and sensual, and destitute of his sanctifying Spirit. Let us also remember, that the doctrine and faith of Christians are "most holy;" that we may build ourselves on them, in all spiritual and devoted obedience to God; praying for, and by, the Holy Spirit, to be preserved in "the love of God," and thus "waiting for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life."—Whilst with tender compassion, or more solemn and awful warnings, (as the case may require,) we seek to recover our fallen brethren, from dangerous heresies and sins; we should "look to ourselves," and "hate even the garment spotted with the flesh," as afraid of being infected with that most fatal pestilence: and still trusting in him, "who is able to keep us from falling, and to present us faultless before the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy;" we should ascribe to him, even God our Saviour, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, all glory, majesty, dominion, and power, now and for evermore. Amen.

THE ## REVELATION OF JOHN THE DIVINE.

It is a singular circumstance, concerning this book, that its authenticity was very generally, if not universally acknowledged, during the two first centuries: and yet in the third century, it began to be questioned! This seems to have arisen from some absurd opinions concerning the Millennium, which were grounded on it by those who maintained them: and therefore their opponents injudiciously and presumptuously endeavored to discredit their tenets, by denying the authority of the book itself. But it was then too late for the success of such an attempt; and its divine original and authority have been fully established by the clearest and most decisive evidence.—Indeed, the prophecies contained in it have, in so many undeniable instances, been most circumstantially accomplished through a long series of ages, that it stands as little in need of external evidence, as any book in the whole scripture. No doubt it was written by John, the apostle, to whose name the title of "The Divine" (or the Theologian, Θεολογος) was added some time after; either because of the deep and mysterious truths relative to the nature, decrees, and counsels of God, with which his writings abound; or because he spoke so much concerning the divine Person and glory of the Lord Jesus. (Θεολογος: Θεος, Λογος.)—The book is styled, "The Apocalypse," or "the Revelation;" (αποκαλυπτω, to unveil, or uncover, what was before hidden;) as consisting of matters chiefly prophetic, which were immediately revealed to St. John from Jesus Christ. This took place, when he was in the isle of Patmos, in the Egean sea, whither he was banished, as is generally thought, by the emperor Domitian, A. D. 94, or 95. Some indeed maintain that this happened much earlier, even during the persecution of Nero, A. D. 67, or 68, or even before that time: but the arguments adduced in support of this opinion are by no means conclusive: and as it stands last in the sacred canon, so it seems to have been written last, and to have been intended to occupy that place. (Notes, 6:1,2, 22:18—21.)—The Revelation opens with the apostle's account of an extraordinary vision, which he had of the Lord Jesus, appearing to him in glory. Then follow seven short epistles from Christ himself, to the seven principal churches in Asia: (Note, Acts 19:8—12.) and after them it contains a series of prophecies, chiefly emblematical, relating to events which would take place, in the church and the nations of the earth, through all the subsequent generations of mankind, to the end of the world, the day of judgment, and the eternal state. This series is sometimes interrupted by explanatory digressions, which will be noted as we proceed: such predictions as are supposed by the author to be already fulfilled, will be compendiously stated with the events to which they relate, according to the judgment of the most approved writers: and an endeavor will be thus far made to render the great outlines of the book as plain as possible to the unlearned reader, whose edification must principally be considered. But in respect of those things, which seem not to be yet fulfilled; a judgment must be formed, and an opinion ventured, with very great caution, and in a very general manner. Many indeed have objected to every attempt to explain a book, so extremely abstruse, and, as they think, unintelligible; nay, some professed Christians, and ministers of the gospel, have even derided these endeavors. No doubt many have affected to be "wise above what is written," and have applied general prophecies by a "private interpretation," in a very unwarrantable manner: (Note, 2 Pet. 1:20,21.) and this should teach others modesty, reverence, and a simple dependence on the teaching of the Holy Spirit, in all their inquiries, whatever helps or advantages they may possess for such investigations. But, if we are enabled to study, write, and read in this manner, there can be no doubt that we shall derive most abundant practical instruction, and obtain increasing vigor to our faith and holy affections, by attending carefully to every part of this most surprising discovery of the Lord's purposes, respecting his church and the world, which was made so many ages before the period of their accomplishment.

'They who censure and dissuade the study of it, do it for the most part, because they have not studied it themselves; and imagine the difficulties to be greater, than they are in reality. It is still "the sure word of prophecy;" and men of learning and leisure cannot better employ their time and abilities, than in studying and explaining this book, provided they do it, as Lord Bacon adviseth, with great wisdom, sobriety, and reverence.—The folly of interpreters has been, as Sir Isaac Newton observes, to foretell times and things by this prophecy, as if God designed to make them prophets. By this rashness they have not only exposed themselves, but brought the prophecy also into contempt. The design of God was much otherwise. He gave this, and the prophecies of the Old Testament, not to gratify men's curiosities, by enabling them to foreknow things; but that after they were fulfilled, they might be interpreted by the event; and his own providence,' (or foresight;) 'not the interpreter's, might be manifest thereby to the world.' Bishop Newton.—It should, however, be admitted, that to give the attentive and pious reader a general assurance of the final and most glorious victory, which the cause of God, of truth and righteousness, shall certainly acquire even on earth, for his encouragement, during the triumphs of superstition, idolatry, heresy, infidelity, and wickedness, which on every side have hitherto been witnessed, or reported from all quarters, was one most important end for which this revelation was given.—But when even the most learned and respectable men attempt, with particularity and exactness, to explain those predictions which are not evidently fulfilled; it commonly happens, that others oppose their interpretation by some counter scheme, supported also by plausible arguments. And while several are thus engaged, each in defending his own conclusions against those who combat them, the readers in general are perplexed, instead of being convinced; the difference between that part which is fulfilled, and may clearly be explained, and the unaccomplished predictions, seems to disappear; the evidence, arising from the fulfilment of prophecy, as demonstrating the divine inspiration of the scriptures, fails of producing its full effect; and not unfrequently, the whole is laid aside, as uncertain or inexplicable, seeing the most learned writers advance such discordant opinions on the subject. In most other controverted topics, truth is generally supposed to lie on one side or the other, or to be divided between the disputants: but in this particular, the debates often produce a kind of skepticism in the minds of very many readers; so that they are led to doubt about the whole and every part of it. In order to avoid this, great care should be taken, to mark strongly the difference between what is fulfilled, and what is not fulfilled; and to draw the line between these, as exactly as may be; that the uncertainty, as to the grand outlines, may not appear to attach to those parts, which have already received their accomplishment, but be wholly confined to the other part.—In respect of those predictions especially, which are supposed to be fulfilling in the eventful period during which we live, peculiar caution is necessary: for an unexpected turn in the affairs of nations, may, after a very few years, confute some of the most plausible and confident assumptions of the expositors; and weaken the credibility in the minds of men, even of those interpretations which are well founded. In fact, I apprehend this has been in many instances strikingly verified since these remarks were first written. It does not, indeed, appear probable, that the prophecies, fulfilling in any age, should be clearly understood by the contemporaries; any more than that impartial histories should be written by men of their own times. The events, in which our interests, and those of the country or party to which we belong, are deeply concerned, must have such an effect upon our minds, as to deduct from that cool and impartial judgment, which is absolutely requisite in inquiries of this nature. It cannot so soon be known, how the successes and advancement of some and the subversion of other powers may terminate: and till that be known, the application of the transactions of our own age to the events predicted in scripture must be attended with a great degree of uncertainty. Our nearness to the objects likewise tends to magnify them to us: and we are apt too readily to conclude, that such important transactions must have a prominent place in prophecy. But, I apprehend, that prophecy (especially that contained in this book) resembles a map of the world, on a small scale; in which only countries, and capital cities, and some very remarkable places, are noticed: so that they, who dwell near considerable cities and large towns, are disappointed at not finding them in the map. Thus the events of a century, through a whole continent, or continents, being foretold in a few verses, or at most in a single short chapter, we certainly shall look in vain for many transactions, which appear to us of very great importance. But those who shall come after us, on reviewing the history of the century, or the continent, and comparing it with the prophecy, will doubtless perceive a sufficient coincidence, to enable them to say, "Thus it was written and thus it must be:" yet, probably, they will find this accomplishment of prophecy materially differing from what the most sagacious of us now suppose. Since the author first printed his thoughts on this book, (in 1792,) most extraordinary changes indeed have taken place, in the state of the nations, and of the visible church; which he doubts not will be found accomplishments of the predictions contained in it. Many books also have been written on the subject; several of which he has considered, and means further to consider, and to make such use of as he is able. But he purposes still to adhere to his former plan; and to be very cautious and general, in attempting to explain what has not hitherto allowedly been fulfilled: and merely supplying this deficiency, (if it be one,) by a few quotations from those who have ventured to be more particular. He does not indeed write for the learned. These may and will consult the several authors, who have purposely and exclusively treated on this subject, and judge for themselves: nor has he the presumption to attempt the office of an umpire, between those who maintain different opinions respecting it. The plan and method, on which he proceeds, will appear to the best advantage, in the notes on the several parts of the prophecy: and a general analysis, or outline of the whole, will be more properly introduced towards the conclusion, than at the beginning of the book.—It is worthy of notice, in respect of the Revelation, that the views given in it of God and heavenly things, of the kingdom of providence and grace, of the Redeemer's glory, the happiness and character of his people, with the wickedness and the ruin of his enemies, are set forth, in so striking and peculiar a manner, that even those who do not at all understand the prophetic meaning, are uniformly interested and edified by reading it, in proportion to the degree of their humility, faith, and piety.

CHAP. I.

The source and design of the book; with a blessing pronounced on those who duly attend to it, 1—3. The apostle salutes the seven churches in Asia; ascribes glory to God; and predicts the coming of Christ to judgment, with the terror and distress of his enemies, 4—7. The Lord declares his own eternity and omnipotence, 8. The place, time, and circumstances of John's vision; with what he heard of the words, and saw of the glory, of Christ; and the commandment given him to write these things to the churches, 9—20.

2 Who <sup>h</sup> bare record of the word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus Christ, <sup>i</sup> and of all things that he saw.

Note.—The Lord Jesus, in his mediatorial character, is the great Prophet of the church, the incarnate "Word of God," by whom he reveals himself to men. (Notes, Deut. 18:15—19. John 1:4—9. Col. 3:16,17. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) In this sense, some things were given to him, "as his revelation," to be through him communicated to his servants, and others were not. (Note, Mark 13:32.) An infinity of the divine designs or decrees remain impenetrably concealed in the mind of God, till the event discovers them; but he has seen good previously to make known some of his purposes respecting future ages, in order to confirm the faith, encourage the hope, and enlarge the views of his people; and that the accomplishment of them, in after times, might demonstrate the truth of the scriptures to every diligent inquirer. (Note, Deut. 29:29.)—This book was therefore called "The Revelation of Jesus Christ;" because its principal subject is, 'A previous discovery of the purposes of God respecting the affairs of the church, and of the nations as connected with it, from the time when it was given, even to the end of the world.' This "Revelation" was given to Jesus Christ, that he might show to his servants those events, which would immediately begin to take place, and which would all shortly be accomplished: as the transient term of some thousands of years bears no proportion to eternity, in which the whole will at length be swallowed up. These things Christ sent "his angel," one of his more illustrious servants in the world above, to signify and explain, in order, to John, who was his principal servant on earth at that time; as it is probable, that he was then the only surviving apostle. (Notes, 17:7,8. 19:9,10. 22:6—9,16,17.) Thus, future events were made known to him; as they had been to several of the ancient prophets, especially Ezekiel, Daniel, and Zechariah.—Accordingly he faithfully testified, and exactly recorded, “the word of God, even the testimony of Jesus Christ,” and all things which he saw in these visions of the Almighty.

Jesus Christ signified, or intimated by his angel, to John his purpose of revealing future things to him: but in whatever way the angel was employed, doubtless the immediate revelation was made by the Holy Spirit, and not by any creature.—The angel Gabriel indeed brought a verbal message to Daniel, containing an extraordinary prophecy: (Notes, Dan. 9:21—27.) but the visions and revelations of this book were not verbal messages. (Notes, 9—11. 2:6,7. 4:1—3. 1 Cor. 2:10—13. 2 Pet. 1:20,21.)

3 <sup>1</sup> Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein: <sup>k</sup> for the time is at hand.

Note.—The apostle introduced his testimony, by solemnly pronouncing a blessing on all, who should read, hear, remember, and obediently observe the words of this prophecy, of which the accomplishment was at hand. This seems to have been prophetically intended to obviate or answer the objections, and obloquy, and ridicule, which would, in after ages, be raised against the study of this mysterious book, and all endeavors to bring others acquainted with it. Nothing tends more to fortify the mind against the cavils of infidels and skeptics, or the incursions of unbelief, or to produce patient hope amidst trials and difficulties, than the observation and experience of the fulfilment of the scriptures, in the events which take place around us: an acquaintance therefore with this Revelation, concerning the purposes of God respecting his church to the end of time, when connected with humility, sobriety, and the obedience of faith, must greatly conduce to the Christian's stability, constancy, hope, peace, and patience. It must exceedingly enlarge his views of the great, and glorious, and stupendous plan of the Lord's providential government of the world, as combined with the redemption of mankind; and direct or encourage his prayers for those prosperous days of the church, in which all her tribulations shall terminate, and animate his exertions in the glorious cause. It also must greatly conduce to reconcile his mind to those events, which, though distressing in themselves, form a part of one vast design, already in a considerable measure accomplished, and evidently hastening to an entire completion; to the eternal glory of God our Saviour, the final victory of his cause over all opposition, and the endless felicity of all his faithful servants. Nay, the very mysteries and difficulties of this book are wonderfully, yet inseparably united, with such grand and interesting discoveries of the glory of God, and the work and worship of heaven, as are peculiarly suited to impress with awe, and to enliven and purify, the soul of the humble and attentive reader, even when he cannot discover the prophetic meaning of the passage. Nor is it any objection to say, that many have read it in another spirit, and got much harm by it: for this is the case with other scriptures; especially with those passages, which may be called “strong meat,” being peculiarly strengthening to the faith, love, and gratitude of such as can digest them: though not meet nourishment for babes; and even capable of being turned into a fatal poison by the vicious affections of a proud and carnal mind. (Notes, Heb. 5:11—14. 2 Pet. 3:14—16.)—The reasons which induce infidels and profane “mockers, who walk according to their own ungodly lusts,” to deride all attempts towards explaining this prophecy, are obvious; for so much of it has most manifestly been already fulfilled, as must forever ruin their cause, could the attention of men be drawn to the subject, in proportion to its vast importance: and no part of scripture more awfully denounces the doom of all impenitent sinners, and all opposers of the gospel. But pious men could never have been led to object to the study of it, as some have done, in strong, nay, rather contemptuous language; had not the misconduct of many in this respect filled them with prejudice, and formed an association of ideas in their minds, which have no necessary relation to each other.—The Lord grant, that the writer and the readers of the present attempt, to render this mysterious book more intelligible and instructive to Christians in general, may rely on and pray for the participation of the blessing here promised, in every part of their progress through it: that, in faith, humility, reverence, and expectation of great advantage, they may read, hear, meditate on, and keep, the things which are written in it, “for the time is at hand,” when the further accomplishment of them will render them so plain, that they shall no longer be either neglected or misunderstood.

Note.—The apostle, contrary to his general custom, prefixing his name, addressed the seven churches of Asia, or that district of which Ephesus was the capital city. (11. Note, Acts 19: 8—12.) The benediction which he used is similar to what has been repeatedly considered, in the epistolary part of the New Testament; but it is here expressed in more sublime and mysterious language, according to the nature of the book to which it is prefixed. He desired and prayed that "grace and peace" might be bestowed on them, "from him who is, who was, and who is to come;" that is, from the self-existent, eternal, and unchangeable JEHOVAH. The original is peculiar, perhaps unexampled, and almost, if not absolutely incapable of an exact translation; the preposition governing the genitive case of the article, and yet all the subsequent words being in the nominative. (Απο τα δε ων και ο ην και ο ερχομενος.) It is supposed to refer to the name of God revealed to Moses; and with a similar disregard to the ordinary rules of grammar. (Notes, Ex. 3:14. John 8:54—59.)—This is here especially meant of the person of the Father. (Notes, 8—11. 22:13. Heb. 13:7,8.)—As "the One true and living God" communicates blessings to sinful man, through the mediation of the incarnate Son, and by the agency of the eternal Spirit; it is almost unavoidable, under such an economy, to speak of the Father in the absolute style of Deity, and of the Son and the Spirit with relation to their assumed characters and offices; though in language evidently implying a participation in all divine perfections, and co-equality with the Father, in their original and essential nature and dignity. Thus "grace and peace" were prayed for, for the Christians addressed "from the seven Spirits, which are before the throne." This is generally, and doubtless justly, interpreted of "the divine Spirit," with respect to the abundance, sufficiency, and variety of his gifts, graces, and operations; and in relation to "the seven churches," with each of which, and all others, the One and self-same Spirit dwelt, as the Fountain of life, grace, and peace; being omnipresent and omnipotent, and One with the Father and the Son, "God over all, blessed for evermore." (Notes, 3:1—3. 5: 5—7.) This manner of expression well accords with the enigmatical or emblematic style of this book; and it is absurd to suppose any created spirits to be joined in this solemn benediction, with the eternal Father, and Jesus Christ the Son of the Father; and indeed it would fully sanction the worship of created angels. (Notes, Matt. 28:19,20. 2 Cor. 13:11—14.) Finally, this grace and peace, were prayed for in their behalf, "from Jesus Christ," as the appointed Mediator, through whom the eternal Spirit, with all his gifts, graces, and consolations, is given to fallen man; and the Saviour was described as "the faithful Witness," who came into the world to bear witness to the perfections, counsels, truths, and will of God to men; and who fully revealed all that he had received from the Father for that purpose. (Marg. Ref. q.—Notes, 3:14—16. Is. 55:4,5.) He was also "the First-begotten from the dead." Being "the Only-begotten of the Father" before all worlds, and "the Heir of all things," he had come on earth in that character, to tabernacle in human nature; and, having been put to death for declaring himself to be "the Son of God," he arose from the dead, among other reasons, to evince that he was what he declared himself to be. (Notes, Rom. 1:1—4. Col. 1:15—20.) Thus he became "the First-fruits of the resurrection," and appeared as "the First-born" of the children of God, in and through whom they shall all arise again, be manifested in their high and honorable character, and be invested with their eternal inheritance. (Notes, Luke 20:27—40.) Being thus arisen from the dead, and exalted to the mediatorial throne, he is also "the Prince," or Sovereign, "of the kings of the earth;" by whom they reign, to whom they are accountable, whose glory they ought to seek; and by whom all will be terribly destroyed, who oppose, despise, or neglect him. This declaration of the Redeemer's sovereignty over all "the kings of the earth," was a proper introduction to the prophecies which were about to be delivered, of the opposition which would be made to his cause, and his final triumph over all his enemies. (Notes, 11:15—18. 17:9—14. 19:11—16. Ps. 2:7—12. 72:8—11. 89:19—37. Prov. 8:15,16.) Animated with a view of the glory of his beloved Lord, and contrasting it with the vastness of his condescension, and the depth of his self-abasement; the inspired writer broke out in adoring praises, "to him who," great and glorious as he was, "had loved them," when defiled with the loathsome stains of guilt and sin, and when deserving the final wrath of God; and whose love had been so immense, that he had "washed them from their sins in his own blood," which he had willingly shed upon the cross, to make satisfaction to divine justice, and to procure all the blessings of salvation for them. And having, in consequence of this atonement, "quickeneth them" by his Holy Spirit; he had taught them, in penitent and obedient faith, to purge their consciences from guilt by the application of his blood; and their hearts from the pollution of sin, by the grace promised through his mediation. In this manner, he had not only "delivered them from the wrath to come," but had also exalted and ennobled them as "kings," to reign with him in eternal glory; and consecrated them as "priests," to be accepted worshippers, and to offer spiritual sacrifices unto "God, even his Father." (Notes, 5:8—10. 1 Pet. 2:4—10.) On these accounts the apostle ascribed unto Christ, personally, the glory and dominion for ever and ever: (Note, Phil. 2:9—11. 2 Pet. 3:17,18.) and in thus "honoring the Son," he especially "honored the Father that sent him;" as all do who cordially add, Amen. (Note, John 5:20—23.) Some indeed apply the doxology to the Father; but the construction is by no means so obvious and natural.

Note.—The prophecy of this book principally relates to the opposition, which, in one form or other, would be made to the cause of Christ; the temporary success of his enemies; and his final triumph over them all: and therefore, at the very opening of it, the reader's attention is called to that great day, when these scenes will be closed, and when all will see the wisdom and happiness of the friends of Christ, and the madness and misery of his enemies. For "behold," with attention and solemn awe, the Saviour who "loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood," "is coming with clouds," or "in the clouds of heaven," in his own glory as Mediator, and in the glory of the Father, to be the Judge of the world! (Notes, 14:14—20. Dan. 7:9—14. Matt. 24:29—31. 26:63—68. Mark 8:33. Acts 1:9—12.) The intervening space would soon pass away, and it might even then be said, "He cometh!" (Note, Jude 14—16.) Then, all nations, being raised from the dead, will be gathered before his tribunal, and "every eye shall see Him," in human nature, exercise omnipotence, omniscience, and all divine perfections, who once lay prostrate in unknown agony at Gethsemane, and was numbered with malefactors on mount Calvary! Then, they especially, "who pierced him," shall be compelled to witness his glory, as well as to feel the power of his avenging indignation. (Notes, Zech. 12:9—14. John 19:31—37.) Judas the traitor, Caiaphas and the chief priests, "Herod and his men of war," Pilate and his soldiers, with all concerned in his condemnation and crucifixion; and those in every age, who by their infidelity, apostacy, persecutions, heresies, and daring crimes, have "crucified him afresh and put him to open shame," shall then with unutterable terror behold him, preparing to pronounce and execute the righteous sentence of their eternal condemnation. And, as "all the kindreds of the earth," through successive generations, hitherto have combined in opposing, despising, perverting, or neglecting him and his great salvation, with the exception only of a small remnant; so will they at that time "wail because of him," in horror and despair; for neither their numbers nor their power can defend them from his omnipotent vengeance. (Note, 6:15—17.) The apostle, however, assured of the justice of these awful proceedings, and knowing that then the redemption of all true Christians will be completed, subjoined to this awful declaration, "Even so, Amen." "Thus let all things" implacable "enemies perish, O LORD." (Note, 22:18—21.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—As the Lord Jesus was evidently spoken of in the preceding verse; it is obvious to conclude that "the Lord," who speaks in this, is the same Person: nor can any sufficient reason be assigned, why it should be understood of "the Father" personally; except that men are reluctant "to honor the Son, even as they" ought to "honor the Father that sent him." The whole vision related to Christ, from whom immediately the revelation was given: (Note, 1,2.) most of the expressions here used, or others equivalent to them, are afterwards spoken by him, and concerning himself, and the construction and arrangement of this passage, and the context, would be very intricate, if we were to suppose the Father to be the Speaker.—The Lord Jesus, therefore, here declared, "that He is the Alpha and the Omega," which are the names of the first and the last letters in the Greek alphabet, the language in which the apostle wrote. This implies, that he is the First Cause and the Last End, the Author and Finisher of all things, in creation, providence, and redemption; "the Beginning and the Ending," the Source of existence, of life, of holiness, and of felicity; and the Completion of them, in every sense, and in all respects.—"Who is, and who was, and who is to come," as One with the eternal Father; (Note, 4—6.) "the Almighty;" the omnipotent and sovereign Ruler of all worlds, by and "for whom all things were made, and by whom all things consist."—No words can more strongly express eternal power and Godhead, than these do. Note.—The apostle next proceeded to relate the manner, in which he had received the revelation that he was about to deliver: and he merely called himself "your brother," addressing himself to Christians, without mentioning his apostolical authority, though, most probably, the only surviving apostle. He was also their "companion in tribulation;" being a persecuted servant of Christ, and exposed to the same sufferings in his cause, as they were; and a fellow-subject with them of the Saviour's kingdom on earth, and a fellow-heir of his heavenly kingdom. These sufferings he endured, as they did, with that submission, constancy, composure, and perseverance, which Christ required and exemplified; through which he experienced present consolations, and expected a happy event of his tribulations. (Notes, 7: 9—17. 2 Thes. 3:1—5.) He was, at the time when he had these visions, in "the Isle of Patmos," whither he had been banished for preaching the word of God, and bearing testimony to Christ: (Notes, 1 John 5:9—12.) and it is recorded, that he was confined to the mines, and compelled to labor in them, notwithstanding the infirmities of his extreme old age. "But none of these things moved him!" (Note, Acts 20: 22—24.) His soul was serene, and at liberty, amidst his sufferings: he had far sweeter comforts than the emperor or any of his prosperous persecutors could obtain; and he expressed no dissatisfaction or emotion, on account of the injustice and cruelty, with which he was treated.—While in this situation, "he was in the Spirit," or brought under the immediate impulse of the Spirit of prophecy; as Ezekiel, Daniel, and others had been, when favored with visions of the Almighty. (Note, 4:1—3.) This was "on the Lord's day," which can be meant of no other, than the day on which the Lord Jesus arose from the dead, even "the first day of the week;" and it is a conclusive proof, that the first day was set apart, and kept holy, by the primitive Christians, in commemoration of that great event: for on what other account could it have been thus mentioned?—(Notes, John 20:19—23. Acts 10:7—12.)—Being thus cast into an ecstasy, he heard behind him a voice, loud and clear as the sound "of a trumpet," saying some of the same words, which have been already considered, or to the same effect. (Note, 8.) They must here be understood of Christ; and this is an additional reason for interpreting the others of him: and the immediate recurrence of them in this connexion, gives energy to the arguments drawn from them. But if any should still be disposed to understand the foregoing passage of the Father; they cannot but admit, that Christ and the Father are One: for otherwise, how can it be conceived that Christ would have used the same words of himself; which had just before been spoken by the Father, as descriptive of his eternal Godhead? So that, on either interpretation, they are conclusive, in respect to the Deity of Christ.—The voice then ordered John to write what he saw, in a book, and send it to the seven churches in Asia, on which we shall have occasion afterwards to make some observations; (Marg. Ref.) but shall in this place only take notice, that it seems to confirm the ancient tradition of John's having resided and labored at Ephesus, and in that vicinity, for a considerable time before his banishment to Patmos.—The testimony of Jesus, (9) 19:10. seen, * and the things which are, † and the things which shall be hereafter;

20 The "mystery of x the seven stars which thou sawest in my right hand, and the seven golden candlesticks. † The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches; ‡ and the seven candlesticks which thou sawest, are the seven churches.

Note.—When the apostle had distinctly heard the words which have been considered, he turned to see from whom the voice proceeded: and he then had a vision of "seven golden candlesticks," in allusion to the golden candlestick with seven branches, which was made for the tabernacle: (Notes, Ex. 25:31—40. Zech. 4:2,3,11—14.) and in the midst of them, as presiding over and taking care of them, he "saw One like unto the Son of man." The apostle had been well acquainted with Jesus, when he was on earth "a Man of sorrows;" (Note, John 13:18—30.) and honored as his peculiar friend: but, while he perceived him in human form, and with some resemblance of his former appearance; he saw him in such resplendent glory, that he seemed quite another person. "He was clothed," after the manner of the priests, "with a garment down to his foot;" perhaps representing his perfect mediatorial righteousness and royal priesthood. This vesture was "girt around his breasts with a golden girdle;" which may denote the preciousness of his love, and the cordiality with which he maintains the cause of his people. (Notes, Ex. 28:15—30. Dan. 10:4—9.) "His hairs like wool," and "white as snow," may signify his majesty, purity, and eternity. (Notes, Dan. 7:9—14.) His "eyes, as a flame of fire," may represent his omniscient acquaintance with the secrets of all hearts, and with the most distant events. (Notes, 2:18,19. 19:11—16. Heb. 4:12,13.) His "feet like fine brass, burning in a furnace," may denote the stability of his appointments, and the transcendent excellency of all his proceedings. (Marg. Ref. d.) His "voice, as the sound of many waters," may represent the energy of his word, to astonish and terrify; or its invincible efficacy to convert or destroy, as he sees good. (Notes, Ex. 1:15—25. 43:1—5. Heb. 4:12,13.) The "seven stars in his right hand" were emblematical of the presiding ministers of the seven churches, to which the apostle was ordered to write; whom Christ upheld, directed, governed, and managed by his power, and according to his will. The "sharp two-edged sword out of his mouth" seems to represent his awful and irresistible justice, in cutting down his enemies on every side, and "slaying them by the breath of his mouth." (Note, Is. 11:2—5.) Moreover, "his countenance was like the sun" at noon-day, when it shines most clearly and powerfully, so that "nothing can be hid from the heat thereof." (Note, Ps. 19:3—6.)—Upon this display of the Redeemer's glory, even his beloved apostle, who had not only "leaned on his breast at table," but had seen his glory on the holy mount, (Note, Matt. 17:1,2.) was utterly overwhelmed with the effulgency of his majesty! (Notes, Dan. 10:4—19.) But the divine Redeemer graciously supported him, and dispelled his fears; again declaring himself, to be the "First and the Last;" (Notes, 8—11.) adding, "I am he that liveth:" the ever-living, self-existent God, to whom, as Mediator, it was "given to have life in himself," and to be "the life of men;" (Notes, John 1:4,5. 14:4—6. 1 John 1:1,2.) who had also been obedient to death for sinners. But, "behold he was alive," as the first-fruits of the resurrection, to die no more; to which the apostle seems to have added, "Amen," as expressive of his unspeakable satisfaction. Nay, so absolute was his conquest over the king of terrors that he had possession of "the keys of hell and of death." He possesses the absolute sovereignty, as dwelling in human nature, over the invisible world, the state of separate spirits, and over death and the grave: so that he removes men out of this life, and consigns their bodies to the grave and corruption, when and as he pleases. He then fixes their souls, in happiness or misery, with absolute authority; and he will soon raise all their dead bodies, and either receive them into heaven, or shut them up for ever in hell, as he sees good. (Note, 20:11—15.) None, therefore, of his friends can have aught to fear from any creature, either during life, or at the approach of death; as every circumstance will certainly be ordered in that manner, which may best subserve their everlasting advantage.—The Lord Jesus then ordered his apostle to write, First, "The things which he had seen:" namely, the circumstances of that vision: Secondly, "The things, which then were," or what related to the state of the churches at that time: and Thirdly, "The things, which should be hereafter," even the prophecies, which he was about to receive: and this seems distinctly to mark out to us the contents of the whole book. (Note, 4:1—3.)—This mysterious and emblematical vision of the seven stars, was then explained to John, to signify "the seven angels," or presiding ministers of the churches, who were the messengers of Christ to them: (Note, 2:1.) and "the seven golden candlesticks" were shown to represent "the seven churches" themselves; as enlightened by the word and Spirit of the Lord, and holding forth that light to others, by the profession and preaching of the word, the administration of holy ordinances, and their Christian conversation and behavior.—Keys. (18) Notes, 3:7. Is. 22:20—25. Matt. 16:19.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The revelations of God, by Jesus Christ, were intended to inform his servants about as much of his designs, respecting them and others, through the short period of time, and to the countless ages of eternity, as it was needful and useful for them to know.—Those who are intrusted with "the word of God and the testimony of Christ," must "bear record of all" things which they know; and "declare the whole counsel of God," as far as it is profitable for those to whom they speak. (Notes, Acts 20:18—27.)—While it becomes us to leave "secret things to God," we ought carefully to read, hear, keep, and obey, whatever he reveals: for "every word of God is pure," and "doeth good to him that walketh uprightly." (Note, Mic. 2:6,7.) Even difficult and mysterious passages will be useful to the humble believer, though he cannot fathom the depth of them; and the times may speedily arrive, when the dispensations of Providence will fully illustrate the meaning of obscure prophecies, to the most unlearned readers.—The "grace and peace," which come from the everlasting and unchangeable love of the Father, by the communion of the omnipresent Spirit, who dwells in all believers; and through "Jesus Christ, the faithful Witness, the First-born from the dead, and the Prince of the kings of the earth;" belong to all those, and to those only, whom he had "washed from their sins, in his own blood;" nor can they sufficiently admire "his love which passeth knowledge," or rejoice in the dignity and felicity, to which he has advanced them; or devote themselves too much to the sacred duties of their royal priesthood; or ascribe too great honor to their divine Redeemer, "to whom be glory and dominion for ever and ever." Amen. This will soon appear: for, "behold, he cometh in the clouds, and every eye" of man, however averse to the sight, "shall see him" placed upon the dread tribunal, from which there can be no appeal. What then will be the terror, dismay, and anguish of his crucifiers, and of all in every age, who have been of their judgment and disposition! and who will "all the kindreds of the earth wail because of him!" while all his faithful followers shall rejoice, and say, "Even so let it be, Lord Jesus: Amen, Amen."—If we would be 'numbered with his saints in glory everlasting;' we must now willingly submit to him, receive him, and honor him, as a Saviour, who (we profess to believe,) 'will come to be our Judge;' for he is "the First and the Last, the Beginning and the Ending," the unchangeable, eternal, and omnipotent Lord, to whom all must be subject, or perish for ever. (Notes, Ps. 2:7—12. 2 Thes. 4:5—10.) And they, who will not believe him to be the great I AM, and who refuse to honor him as co-equal with the Father, will discover their awful mistake, when made to feel the weight of his anger, and the power of that eternal vengeance, which they now despise.

V. 9—20.

Those who are brethren to the apostles and ancient servants of Christ, and partakers of their faith and grace, must expect to be "companions" with them "in tribulation, and in the patience," as well as "the kingdom" of their Lord: though few are called to suffer so much, as they endured in this good cause. A peaceful conscience, however, and the consolations of the Holy Spirit, will enable the afflicted Christian to be more joyful in communion with God, when immured in a prison, than ungodly men can be in the most prosperous circumstances. If believers are confined, on the Lord's holy day, from public ordinances and the communion of saints, by necessity and not by choice; they may expect great comfort in meditation and secret duties, from the influences of the Spirit; and by hearing the voice and contemplating the glory of their beloved Saviour, of whose gracious visits no confinement or circumstances can deprive them. The name itself shows how this sacred day should be observed: surely "the Lord's day" should be wholly devoted to the Lord; and none of its hours employed in a secular, sensual, or dissipated manner.—We may well be satisfied to walk by faith, during our continuance here on earth; for could we now see the Lord "as he is," the displays of his glory, even as dwelling in human nature, would overwhelm us: (Notes, Is. 6:1—7. John 12:37—41.) and we must be totally changed in body and soul, before we can bear the effulgency of his majesty, and find unalloyed happiness in that beatific vision. Let us then at present hearken to his voice, lean on his arm, and receive the encouragements of his love to obviate our fears: for what can he, "the First and the Last," even the eternal Son of the Father, withhold from those, for whom he became incarnate, that he might die for their sins, and what can be too hard for him, who has "the keys of death and hell," and lives as our almighty Friend for evermore? (Notes, John 14:18—20. Acts 7:51—54. Rom. 5:6—10. 8:32—39. Col. 3:1—4.) May we then obey his word and walk in his light: may "our light," as derived from him, "shine before men," for their conviction and edification; and thus may we expect the time of our departure hence; which, with every thing relative to it, will be appointed by his unerring wisdom and love; who will come to receive our souls to his presence; and who will at length raise and change "the bodies of our humiliation" also, "that they may be like unto his glorified body, according to the mighty power, by which he is able to subdue all things unto himself." (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:20—28,50—58. Phil. 3:20,21. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.)

The epistle of Christ to the angel of the church of Ephesus; consisting of commendation and reproof, a call to repentance, a solemn warning, and a gracious promise to those who overcame, 1—7. That to Smyrna, replete with commendation, and encouraging exhortations to faithfulness under tribulation, 8—11. That to Pergamos; in which are warnings against the Nicolaitans, threatenings of judgments on the impenitent, and promises to the victorious, 12—17. That to Thyatira, nearly of similar import, 18—29.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Many expositors have imagined, that these epistles, to the seven churches, were mystical prophecies of seven distinct periods, into which the whole term, from the apostle's days to the end of the world, would be divided. But there is no proof from scripture, that seven such periods, and no more, were to be expected, in the state of the church; unless the epistles themselves be admitted as proofs of it: nor are there any distinct traces in ecclesiastical history, in respect of such as are supposed to be already past; though a lively imagination and a prompt invention, may advance plausible things on the subject. It cannot be conceived, if the concluding part of this book itself be recollected, that the last period of the church will be worse than any that has gone before, as the Laodicean church was far more corrupt than any of the rest. (Notes, 20:1—10.) Nor can it be true in fact, that a more flourishing period succeeded that of the church in the apostles' days, or that immediately subsequent to their death: yet the state of the church of Smyrna was far purer and more excellent, than that of Ephesus, nay, perhaps than that of Philadelphia, which on this hypothesis must accord to the Millennium. So that there seems no ground at all for this sentiment, though it has been sanctioned by many respectable names.—But the churches, here addressed, were in such different states, in respect of purity of doctrine, and “the power of godliness;” that the words of Christ to them will always be suitable to the case of other churches, and professors of Christianity, in all ages and places, to the end of the world: and some of them contain the proper message or instruction to those of one character, and some to those of another, in all the variety which they contain.—The Lord Jesus himself, appearing in vision to John, directed him what to write to each of these seven churches: so that, in fact, they may be considered as “the epistles of Jesus Christ;” even as those which the apostle wrote by an amanuensis, are called properly “the epistles of Paul.”—Each of these was addressed to “the angel of the church,” the stated messenger or ambassador of Christ among them. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:18—21.) It is more natural to understand this of one presiding minister, than of several elders or pastors spoken of collectively, because one in office; and thus it countenances the opinion, which has been advanced, concerning the introduction of a moderate kind of episcopacy in the primitive church, even in the days of the apostles. (Notes, Acts 20:17. 1 Tim. 5:21, 22, 24, 25. Tit. 1:5—9.) It is also undeniable, that there were several elders, or pastors, in the church at Ephesus, before this time; so that some ruler, or minister, presiding over the other pastors, must be intended.—The address to “the angel of the church” doubtless implied commendation, reproof, instruction, or encouragement to him personally, and to the pastors in general, on whose ministry and example the state of each church greatly depends: yet the church was principally intended. That of Ephesus was planted by St. Paul. (Notes, Acts 18:18—23. 19:.) There is no proof that Timothy ever stately resided there: (Note, Acts 20:1—6. Preface to 1 Tim.) nearly thirty years seem to have elapsed, since the second epistle of St. Paul to Timothy was written; various changes had doubtless taken place in that time: and it was longer since St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Ephesians. John himself is also recorded to have abode at Ephesus, and to have superintended that and the neighboring churches for several years.—Ephesus was the capital of the province called Asia; (Note, Acts 19:8—12.) and the apostle was directed to write the first epistle to the church in that city, as a message from “him that holdeth the seven stars in his right hand, and walketh amidst the seven golden candlesticks.” (Note, 1:12—20.) This intimated the absolute authority of Christ over his ministers, with their entire dependence on him; and his constant, though invisible presence with his churches, in which he had fixed the light of his word and ordinances; (Note, Matt. 28:19, 20.) his attention to their whole conduct; his readiness to help and bless them, whilst they made a proper use of their light; and his power and purpose to remove it, if provoked by their perversion or neglect of it.—They shine by his light, and are absolutely under his control and at his disposal.

2 I know thy works, and thy labor, and thy patience, and how thou canst not bear them which are evil: and thou hast tried them which say they are apostles, and are not, and hast found them liars:

3 And hast borne, and hast patience, and for my name's sake hast labored, and hast not fainted.

4 Nevertheless, I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love.

5 Remember therefore, from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the first works; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent.

Note. Our Lord reminded the presiding minister at Ephesus, and by him all the church, that he knew, or observed and accepted, “their works of faith and love,” (Marg. Ref. e.) the labor which they bestowed in his service, their “patient continuance in well-doing,” under heavy trials and afflictions; and their decided abhorrence of false teachers and evil workers, whom they would not on any account endure in their communion. He had likewise noticed, with approbation, the trial which they had made of certain persons, who confidently claimed apostolical authority, as if immediately commissioned by Christ himself, and had thus attempted to draw them off from “the faith once delivered to the saints;” and how they had found them out to be impostors. (Notes, Matt. 7:15—20. 1 John 4:1—3. 2 John 7—11.) They had also repeatedly endured affliction, and exercised patience in the cause of Christ; and he repeatedly took a kind notice of it, and of their persevering labors, without wearying or fainting, from a regard to his name. (Notes, Prov. 24:10. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. Gal. 6:6—10. 2 Thes. 3:13.) Nevertheless, he had somewhat to allege against them; because the fervency of their love to him, and their zeal for his glory had sensibly declined, since they first embraced Christianity; and they had become more negligent and formal than they used to be. This abatement of holy affection naturally tended to still more apparent and evident evil: the Lord therefore called on them to recollect, how lively, zealous, fervent, united, and active they had been; and to compare their present fallen condition with it; that thus they might be excited to "repent and do their first works." Else he would come, by his providence, in a short time and an unexpected manner, and "remove their candlestick out of its place;" or deprive them of the light of the gospel, and the advantage of its ordinances: nor could this judgment be averted without "repentance and works meet for repentance."—This sentence was after a time most awfully executed: and at this day, Ephesus, which was so renowned a city, is an inconsiderable village, in which there are none who so much as bear the Christian name.—There is some difficulty in conceiving, how the persevering diligence and patience of this church, could consist with that abatement in love, with which it is charged. But observation and experience combine to prove, that in many instances, while the affections are lively and fervent, men engage zealously in services, and form habits of exertion, self-denial, patience, and courageous disregard to opposition and reproach; in which, as to the outward conduct at least, they persevere, from various motives, and often conscientiously; though it is lamentably true, and they know it, that their hearts are not so thoroughly engaged in what they do, as they once were. Many are well aware, that this is their case: they have zeal enough to retain them, in their former course of active service, which is become habitual, and in some circles creditable: but had they not been more "fervent in spirit, serving the Lord," in former days, those habits would never have been formed, those services had never been engaged in. Perhaps most Christians are too apt to take encouragement from such diligence, and to silence the remonstrances of their consciences by it: but it is plain, that our Saviour and Judge considers this, as a very criminal state of heart and conduct.

Note.—The Ephesian church, though declined in love, was not corrupted with licentious principles, or immoral practices, but hated and detested "the deeds of the Nicolaitans," which Christ also abhorred. This, as it will be shown presently, was a sect of avowed and most abominable Antinomians. (Notes, 14—16. 2 Tim. 2:14—18. 3:1—9.)—But, whilst these things were immediately addressed to the rulers, pastors, and church at Ephesus; every person in all other places, and in all future ages, "who had an ear," and could perceive the meaning of the words, was concerned to attend to them; and to all those things, which the Holy Spirit (by whose agency, the apostle had this vision of Christ speaking to him,) thus declared unto the churches. (Note, 1:1, 2.)—This is a most emphatical call to ministers and Christians, in every age, carefully and diligently to study these epistles to the churches; as replete with most important instruction, not only to those immediately addressed, but to all others, "even to the end of the world." (Marg. Ref. a.)—After this solemn introduction the Lord Jesus promised to every man, who, by faith in him, should overcome the temptations of the world, the flesh, and the devil; (Notes, 1 John 4:4—6. 5:4,5.) and especially those, to which his peculiar disposition or circumstances most exposed him; that he would give "him to eat of the Tree of life."—This is a figurative expression taken from the account of the garden of Eden; (Notes, Gen. 2:8,9. 3:22—44.) and denoting the pure, satisfactory, and eternal joys of heaven; and the anticipation of them in this world, by faith, communion with Christ, and the consolations of his Holy Spirit. (Notes, 22:2—5. Ez. 47:12.) Every victory over sharp temptation would be graciously rewarded with foretastes of this fruit; and the final victory, with the eternal fruition of the happiness intended by it, in heaven itself, and in the presence and love of God. sage of him, who is "the First and the Last." (Note, 1:8—11.) These words were spoken by JEHOVAH of himself, when declaring his own eternal Deity, and asserting "that beside him there was no God, yea, he knew not any:" (Note, Is. 44:6—8.) so that the repeated use of them by the Lord Jesus must be allowed by all, who reverence the words of the prophets and apostles, to be a full proof, that he is the self-existent and eternal God. And, as the distinction between the Father and the Son, is every where established, whilst it is declared that there is but "one living and true God;" it might easily be proved in form, that there can be no consistent alternative, between rejecting the Bible, or denying it to be the unerring word of God, and acknowledging a plurality of Persons in the Unity of the Godhead. For the same has repeatedly been shown concerning the Holy Spirit, in respect of the attributes and operations peculiar to Deity, and his distinct personal subsistence. (Notes, John 14: 15—17. 16:8—13. 1 Cor. 2:10—13. 3:16,17. 12:4—11.) Thus the doctrine of the Trinity is fixed on the firm basis of divine revelation: and it will always be found, that no other scheme, however modified, can be supported by any learning, ingenuity, or diligence of man, except with a proportionable disregard to the oracles of God: and the full establishment of such doctrine must be the effect of a total disbelief of the scriptures, in respect of the nature, subsistence, and perfections of the Godhead. The church, indeed, as built on the Person of Christ, cannot be subverted by "the gates of hell:" (Note, Matt. 16:18.) and though we may well be concerned for our children, and the cause of the gospel in these lands; and should therefore use every proper method of "earnestly contending for the truth once delivered to the saints:" yet we may be free from anxiety about the event of the contest, and predict, that the triumphing of those, who strive against "the First and the Last," will assuredly be short.—He who thus asserted his own essential Deity, in the same place gave an intimation of his incarnation, death, resurrection, and everlasting intercession: (1:18.) and, in the character of the omnipotent Friend and Saviour of his people, he assured the Christians at Smyrna, that he noticed and accepted their works, and was well acquainted with their trials and poverty: for though Smyrna was a rich and populous city; either the poorest of the inhabitants alone had been converted, or the Christians there had been impoverished by persecution. They were indeed poor in the world, as well as "poor in spirit;" (Notes, Matt. 5:3. Jam. 1:9—11.) yet Christ declared, "that they were rich in faith," and by an interest in his "unsearchable riches," and the precious promises of the new covenant; rich in wisdom, grace, and good works, and as heirs of an unfailling treasure in heaven: (Notes, 3: 17. 1 Cor. 3:15—23. 2 Cor. 6:3—10. Jam. 2:5—7.) for they were in a very flourishing state in respect of their souls, though greatly reduced in their outward circumstances. (Note, 3 John 1—4.)—Moreover, he knew the blasphemy of certain persons, who "said they were Jews," and reviled both them and him. Some think that these men professed Christianity: but in their zeal for the Mosaic law, they spoke such things of the Person and righteousness of Christ, as amounted to constructive blasphemy: but it is more obvious to conclude, that they were virulent opposers and persecutors, who "contradicted and blasphemed" as the Jews at Antioch in Pisidia had done, at the time when St. Paul preached among them. (Acts 13:45.) They professed to be Jews, and the people and worshippers of God; but they were not what they professed to be. Whether they were of the Jewish nation or not, God did not allow of them as his congregation; the rites for which they contended were no longer of any validity; their worship was carnal and hypocritical; they violently opposed the truth and cause of God; and they were in fact "the synagogue of Satan," a company of people, bearing the image, copying the example, doing the works, and combining together to support the kingdom of the devil. (Notes, 3:8,9. John 8:41—47.)

10 Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer: behold, <sup>m</sup> the devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried; and "ye shall have tribulation" ten days: <sup>p</sup> be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee <sup>q</sup> a crown of life.

11 He <sup>r</sup> that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; He that overcometh shall not be hurt of <sup>s</sup> the second death.

Note.—The concluding verses intimate, that the persons above mentioned were fierce persecutors, and not subtle deceivers: for Christ did not warn his people to beware of false doctrine; but to prepare for the cross. He exhorted them "to fear none of those things which they should suffer:" for he, "the First, and the Last," was able to protect, support, comfort, uphold, and deliver them. Yet, behold, he saw good to permit the devil to prevail so far, that he would cast some of them into prison, by means of "his synagogue" of professed Jews, who probably stirred up the people and magistrates against them. Their enemies meant that they should thus be destroyed; but their Lord and Saviour permitted it, that they might be tried, and proved, and purified. (Notes, Dan. 12:10. Zech. 13:8,9. Mal. 3:1—4. Jam. 1:2—5. 1 Pet. 1:6,7. 4:12—16.) For this purpose they would have "tribulation ten days." This may either mean ten years, which is recorded to have been the duration of Domitian's persecution; or a considerable but limited time; during which space, many of them might be called to suffer martyrdom for the truth. The Lord therefore exhorted them to be "faithful unto death;" maintaining their allegiance to him inviolable, fighting valiantly as his soldiers, and adhering to his truth and will, even if called to suffer death for his sake; or in any case, till the close of their lives. And then he "who had been dead, and was alive," would recompense them, as no other prince or captain could do his faithful adherents; for he would give them "a crown of life," or eternal glory and felicity. (Notes, Acts 7: 54—60. Jam. 1:12.)—This epistle also concerned all, who could hear and understand; as no one, who conquered in this spiritual warfare, should be hurt by "the second death;" though he might die in winning the battle. But he, "who hath the keys of hell and death," engaged to secure the souls of his servants, at the time of their dissolution, and their bodies at the resurrection; that they should not be finally separated from God, or sent away into the everlasting punishment, prepared for all wicked men; which is emphatically called "the second death;" on the contrary they would be preserved from every degree of this misery, and receive the gift of eternal felicity, after their transient sufferings in this world. (Notes, 20: 4—6, 11—15.)—Nothing of reproof or warning is contained in this epistle: and it is remarkable, that there are more Christians at this day in Smyrna, than at any other place in all that part of the world: the candlestick has not wholly been removed from them; but some glimmerings of light are still continued to the harassed remnant of this church.—*The devil, &c. 12 ¶ And to <sup>1</sup>the angel of the church in Pergamos write; These things saith he <sup>u</sup> which hath the sharp sword with two edges;

Note.—This epistle, "to the angel of the church in Pergamos," (a city to the north of Smyrna,) contains both reproof and threatenings; and therefore it was sent as from him, "who hath the sharp sword with two edges." (Notes, 14—16. 1:16. 19:11—16. Is. 11:2—5.)—The Lord Jesus Christ took favorable notice of the works of the Christians in this city, as far as they were obedient to his commandments; and he reminded them, that he knew their habitation to be in a place, where Satan had especially established his throne, and taken up his abode. This must denote, that Pergamos was not only a very wicked city in other respects, but also that it was, as it were, the head quarters of both persecution and heresy; the two principal engines of the devil, in opposing the pure gospel of Christ: and that from thence these dire evils diffused their baleful influence to other cities. (Note, Acts 20: 29—31.) Yet, even in this perilous situation, the church in general held fast and professed the truth of the gospel, and a zealous regard to the honor and authority of Christ: so that they had not "denied the faith," either by open apostasy, or by temporizing to avoid the cross; not even in those trying days, in which Antipas (who probably was a pastor of the church,) had been a faithful witness to the truth of Christ, and had been slain for his testimony, by those among whom Satan dwelt.—"Ecclesiastical history has not informed us, who this Antipas was.—Perhaps he was some zealous minister; ... or some private Christian of obscure birth, rank, and circumstances, enabled by enduring martyrdom in the Christian cause. ... This condescending notice taken of him by his divine Master, ... would ... animate the courage and fidelity of other Christians, who might be called out to like extremities." Doddridge.

Note.—The Lord had, however, "a few things," to allege against the church of Pergamos: because they had permitted in their communion, or otherwise connived at, some of those licentious teachers, against whom his apostles had protested; even such as "held the doctrine of Balaam." For that wicked man, though really favored with prophetic visions, had yet, "for filthy lucre's sake," plotted mischief against Israel, by teaching Balak to seduce them into idolatry and fornication; and thus to throw in their way an occasion of falling into sin, and under the wrath of God. (Notes, 2 Pet. 2:15, 16. Jude 11—13.) In like manner, the church at Pergamos contained persons, who held "the doctrine of the Nicolaitans," which thing (that is, the doctrine, and all which was connected with it,) Christ hated. Hence it is evident, that the teachers of this sect sought "the wages of unrighteousness," by endeavoring to corrupt and pervert professed Christians; and that, in order to obtain them, they laid "stumbling-blocks" in their way; and, on some pretence or other, encouraged and enticed them to join in the idolatrous feasts of their neighbors; and on those occasions, and at other times, to commit fornication. (Notes, Num. 25: 1 Cor. 8:7—13. 10:23—28.) They might, perhaps, inculcate the lawfulness of dissembling their religion to escape persecution, which is an occasion of falling to numbers in circumstances which expose men to it: and joining in the idolatry and excess of the heathen worship would effectually answer this end. They, however, certainly grafted this prevarication on more general principles; and an erroneous and perverted view of the evangelical doctrine of "salvation by grace," and concerning Christian liberty, constituted "the root of bitterness," from which their evil practices naturally grew. "They turned the grace of God into lasciviousness," and taught others to do the same, and were the Antinomians of the primitive church; a heresy, which, in one form or other, has always hitherto sprung up, when the true gospel of Christ has been successfully preached; being a kind of tare, which the enemy will at all times sow among the good seed, as far as he is permitted.—Many have supposed, that this sect derived its name from Nicholas; one of the primitive deacons: and such a tradition prevailed early in the church. Yet the name was then so common, and might be given to the sect on so many other accounts, that there is no certainty in it. We read nothing of Nicholas in scripture, to warrant so unfavorable an opinion of him: neither Peter nor Jude, who opposed heretics of the same stamp, called them by this name; and it may thence, almost with certainty, be concluded, that it was afterwards given them. Some have noted that Nicolaus, in Greek, signifies the same as Balaam does in Hebrew, namely, 'the conqueror of the people;' and have thence inferred, that they were so called from the influence which they obtained over men's minds, and the fatal use which they made of it, as Balaam had done before them.—The Lord, however, commanded the church of Pergamos to repent, and forsake these corrupt practices and principles; to exclude such scandalous and pernicious persons from their communion; and by every means to show a decided abhorrence of their tenets: otherwise, he would quickly visit them in judgment, and fight against the deceivers, and all who countenanced them, "with the sword of his mouth;" inflicting the threatened vengeance on them: nay, he would even deprive the church of their abused privileges.—This city is at present in a very ruinous condition; very few professed Christians are found in it, and they are wholly dependant on the church at Smyrna; being in a most abject state, and having scarcely any thing of our holy religion, except the empty name.

17 He <sup>n</sup> that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; To him that overcometh will I give <sup>o</sup> to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone <sup>p</sup> a new name written, which no man knoweth, saving he that receiveth it.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—What the Spirit spake by John, to the church at Pergamos, was meant for the instruction of all, who should ever hear or read it: for whilst judgments impended over the head of the impenitent, blessings were prepared for those, who overcame the multiplied temptations to which they were exposed. To each person, who thus adhered to the truth and precepts of Christ, he promised to give "the hidden manna;" or those invigorating and satisfying consolations, which spring from the lively exercise of faith in a crucified Saviour; a steadfast contemplation of the glory of God in him; and communion with the Father and the Son, by the influences of the Holy Spirit. (Notes, Ex. 16: John 6:47—58.) This manna is hidden from carnal men; who see neither the source, the nature, the communication, nor the excellency of it: it is placed out of the reach of every enemy; nor can the supplies of it be intercepted: so that it is "the secret of the Lord, which is with them that fear him."—The gracious Saviour also promised to give to every conqueror, in this holy war, "a white stone." In ancient times, when any person among the Greeks, accused of crimes against the state, was tried by the suffrages of the citizens; they balloted for his acquittal by a white stone, and for his condemnation by a black one: so that Christ, the sole Judge of his people, in promising to give the victors "a white stone," assured them of their full justification at the great day of account; and of the present comfortable sense, that they were pardoned and accepted in him. The name written upon it is probably that of, "children of God;" and it represents the inseparable connexion of adoption into his family with forgiveness of sins. This name would be, as it were, inscribed upon the pardon given them, and made legible to the soul by "the Spirit of adoption." (Note, Rom. 8:14—17.) But "no man knoweth it, saving he that receiveth it:" for the ground of this knowledge is laid in his inward consciousness and experience; it is communicated to the lively Christian by "a witness in himself;" the world knoweth not the children of God; (Notes, 1 John 3:1—3. 5:9,10.) and even their brethren cannot exactly distinguish them, so that sometimes they suspect or condemn the upright, and think well of specious hypocrites. But when the Holy Spirit illuminates his own work in the believer's soul, this "new name," and its real import, become legible and intelligible to him, and he knows himself to be a child and heir of God.—The expression may also signify, that the felicity which awaits the children of God, when they shall have obtained a complete victory over all their enemies, can never be understood, but by the enjoyment of it: yet, I apprehend, that present consolations, as the gracious recompense of victory over particular urgent temptations, were principally, though not exclusively intended.

Note.—Thyatira lay to the south-east of Pergamos; and the epistle, to the church established in that city, was sent in the name of the “Son of God, who hath his eyes as a flame of fire;” which represented his authority and omniscience, and the steadfastness and righteousness of his appointments and decisions. “The Son of God” here reminded the pastors, and Christians at Thyatira also, that he knew their works, and observed with approbation their love of him, and of the brethren, and their general benevolence; their diligent attention to the various duties, by which they were called to serve him and each other, in the church and the community; their bold and steadfast profession of his doctrine, in genuine faith; the patience, with which they perseveringly endured afflictions and persecutions; and especially that their last works were more abundant than those, which they had at first performed. (Notes, 2—5. 2 Thes. 1:3,4.)—Son of God, &c. (18) Compare 1:13,14.

23 And I will kill her children <sup>f</sup>with death; <sup>g</sup>and all the churches shall know that <sup>h</sup>I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts: <sup>i</sup>and I will give unto every one of you according to your works.

Note.—Thus far the church at Thyatira seemed in a flourishing condition: yet there was a worm at the root of its prosperity, which would destroy the whole, unless it were removed. Notwithstanding all those things which deserved commendation, the Lord Jesus had “a few things” to allege against the presiding minister and the pastors at Thyatira, especially because they suffered such persons as taught those abominable tenets, and perpetrated those evils, which Christ hated: for the same heresy is here doubtless opposed, as in the foregoing epistle. It is not agreed, whether the expression, “that woman Jezebel,” is to be understood literally, or figuratively. From the reading in some manuscripts it has been thought, that the wife of the presiding minister was intended; that she had obtained great influence in the affairs of the church, and made a bad use of it; that she pretended to prophetic gifts, and under that sanction propagated abominable principles; and though her conduct was disapproved by many, yet no proper decision was used in censuring her, or preventing the mischiefs which she occasioned.—The figurative meaning, however, seems more suited to the style and manner of this book: and in this sense, we may understand it to denote a company of persons, of the spirit and character of Jezebel, within the church, under one principal deceiver; as the Roman antichrist is represented by the emblem of an abandoned harlot. (Notes, 17:1—5.) Jezebel, a Zidonian, and a zealous idolater, being married to the king of Israel, contrary to the divine law, used all her influence to seduce the Israelites from the worship of JEHOVAH into idolatry, with which the vilest licentiousness was connected; and this greatly aided the temptation. (Marg. Ref. a.) Thus these persons at Thyatira, having, through the fault of the pastors and members of the church, found admission among them, and by their artifices and blandishments attached a party to their cause, employed their whole influence to draw men from the pure religion of Christ, into carnal and spiritual fornication and adultery, and to poison their minds with abominable doctrines. Yet, they had not been duly censured and opposed: and it is evident, that neither the fatal tendency of their opinions, nor the atrociousness of their conduct, had been fully noticed and understood, till this epistle was sent. (Notes, 1 Cor. 5:) This evil had long been working: and the Lord<sup>h</sup> had, in his long-suffering, “given space for repentance” to the ringleader, and those who abetted the delusion; but they still persisted in their wickedness. He therefore declared that he would cast the principal offender “into a bed,” as visited with some painful and incurable disease, at length to terminate in death; whilst such as had been seduced to join in these abominations, would, “unless they repented of their deeds,” be thrown into the most grievous afflictions. (Note, 1 Cor. 11:29—34.) Indeed Christ, their Lord and Judge, purposed to destroy by pestilence, or other tremendous judgments, these seducers, and their whole progeny, or party; in order, that “all the churches” might be assured, by the detection and exemplary punishment of such scandalous offenders, that he was that glorious God, who claimed it as his peculiar prerogative “to search the reins and hearts” of men; to discern all their secret imaginations, purposes, and inclinations; and to render to every one of them according to his works.—Here again the peculiar style of Deity is employed by “the Son of God.” It is far more expressive to say, “I am he, who searcheth the heart” than “I search:” nor can such language be accounted for, on any other ground than the trinitarian doctrine, whatever pains and ingenuity may be employed in the attempt. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Jer. 17:9,10.)

trine, and which have not known <sup>k</sup> the depths of Satan, as they speak; <sup>1</sup> I will put upon you none other burden:

28 And I <sup>t</sup> will give him the morning star.

Note.—To those who repented, and separated from the evils before mentioned; and to the rest, who had never received that doctrine, and had no acquaintance with those “depths,” as they called them; perhaps avowing that they were peculiarly “the deep things of God,” but which Christ declared to be “the depths of Satan,” the most sagacious, and covert devices of that enemy, to dishonor Christ and destroy men’s souls;—to such as had kept clear, or had got free, from these “mysteries of iniquity,” he would give no other command or injunction, than what they had already received from his ministers. (Note, Matt. 11:28—30.) But he exhorted them to hold fast those truths and precepts, till he came to remove them by death, or to judge the world. He also promised to every man, who overcame these too generally successful temptations, and kept his words in “the obedience of faith;” that he would grant him the privilege of sharing his victories, and the authority connected with them, as far as this could add to his true honor or felicity; so that he should be partaker of the honor, joy, and triumph, which would arise to the Redeemer, when all the nations of his enemies shall be dashed in pieces, as the potter’s fragile vessel by the blow of an iron rod. (Notes, 16:18: 19: Ps. 2:7—9. 149: Is. 34: 63:1—6. Ez. 38: 39:.) He will also be an assessor of Christ in judgment, and concur in the sentence denounced on the nations of the ungodly. (Notes, 3:20—22. 1 Cor. 6:1—6.) Thus the victorious believer will receive from Christ, “glory, honor, immortality,” and an immovable kingdom; even as He has “received of the Father.” (Note, Matt. 28:18.)—Moreover, he promised to give him “the morning star,” which may either mean the earnest of the Spirit, as introductory to the felicity of heaven, as the morning-star to the rising of the sun; (Note, 2 Pet. 1:19—21.) or the ineffable glory, with which he will invest his victorious disciples, in the presence and enjoyment of him their Lord and Saviour, and in conformity to his glory. Note.—This concerned all other professed Christians, as much as those to whom it was immediately written. (Marg. Ref.)—This church is at present wholly extinct, and the city is in a very desolate condition.—Each epistle begins with “These things saith the Son of God, &c.” and each ends with the call; “Let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches.”—What “Christ saith,” that “the Spirit saith;” the same individual words and works are ascribed to each; as in many instances to the Father and to the Son. “For the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit” are three; and “these three are one.”

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord Jesus alone can uphold and prosper his ministers; their light is wholly derived from him and maintained by him; he supports them by his powerful right hand, and disposes of them in his sovereign wisdom. It therefore behoves all those, who are favored with able and faithful teachers, to be thankful for them, to walk in the light thus vouchsafed them, and to be careful that they do not provoke the Lord to remove it. And all, who sustain that important and arduous office, should remember their dependence on Christ, and their accountableness to him; and “take heed to themselves, and to their doctrine,” “and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost has made them overseers; to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood.” (Notes, Acts 20:28. 1 Tim. 4:11—16.)—In all these respects, the presiding ministers, whether called Bishops, or by some other name, should remember, that the largest proportion of responsibility attaches to them; their conduct is more extensively beneficial, or the contrary, than that of inferior pastors; and their judgment will be proportionably useful, if they neglect their duty, connive at iniquity and false doctrine; or mislead their inferiors by heretical instruction, or a worldly example. If they have “the rejoicing in the testimony of their own consciences;” to their simplicity and godly sincerity in this sacred service; the impartial retrospect may give them confidence, that he will make their cause his own.—The manifold evils, which abound in every part of the church, in a very great degree, arise from the misconduct and negligence of its rulers and pastors, who ought especially to weigh with great seriousness, and much self-examination, as in the prospect of the last decisive day, the import of these epistles of Christ; and frequently they will find cause to apply to themselves a great part of the reproof and warning, which they contain.—Our Lord is “like a man who is gone into a far country, having given to every servant his work:" but faith realizes him, as "walking in the midst of the golden candlesticks," both in respect of his omnipotent Deity, and his omnipresent and all-pervading Spirit. He observes the conduct of those, who have the light of his word and ordinances, and maintains that light, so long as a good use is made of it: but he will not fail to rebuke and correct those, who walk inconsistently; and he continues his golden candlestick in one place, and removes it from another, as he sees good; for all second causes are wholly subservient to his all-disposing sovereign will, but he orders the whole in perfect wisdom, equity, and truth.

V. 2—7.

Our gracious Lord "seeth in secret," and is not backward to commend "the work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope" of his servants. (Notes, Matt. 6:1—4. 1 Cor. 4:1—5.) He marks and approves their abhorrence of that which is evil, and their separation from the company, and protestation against the misconduct, of those who profess the gospel, but disgrace it by their crimes. (Notes, 1 Cor. 5: 2 Thes. 3:6—9, 14, 15. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. 2 Tim. 3:1—5.) Nor does he less approve their conduct, in examining the pretensions of those who speak in his name, or claim attention, as immediately inspired by him; that they may detect and condemn those as "liars," who contradict the doctrine of his holy word. He also kindly notices the trials and hardships, which his people bear, and the patience with which they endure them; and "how for his name's sake they labor, and have not fainted." Thus he sets ministers, parents, masters, and seniors, an example of commending what is right in those placed under their care; and of thus introducing needful reproof. But he will by no means connive at what is evil, in any kind or degree. Even when believers and churches steadily profess his truth, attend on his ordinances, and outwardly obey his precepts; yet he "hath somewhat against them," if they decline from the fervor of their "first love:" nay, he not only reproves them for these abatements in affection and zeal; but threatens, that unless they "remember whence they are fallen, and repent, and do their first works, he will quickly remove their candlestick out of his place." The present state of Christianity, in the cities mentioned in these epistles, is an alarming instance of the divine truth and justice in this respect; and in every age he calls on all, who have eyes to see, and "ears to hear," to observe the truth of what "the Spirit said unto the churches."—The state of religion in most places where a reformation from popery took place, and with several descriptions of Christians among us where once spiritual religion shone most illustriously, manifestly prove, that he still removes the candlestick from those "who forsake their first love," and do not repent at his call; even though they hate and strongly protest against "the deeds of Nicolaitans" and antinomians, "which he hateth." This should teach those, who now have the light, to "be zealous and repent;" lest they too should be left in the dark. And surely this single mention in scripture, of Christians "forsaking their first love," when the context and consequences are well considered, most awfully reproves those numbers, who speak of this as a common case; who excuse lukewarmness and sloth, in themselves and others, as a thing of course, by words to this effect; (Note, 3:14—16.) and who, speaking of Christians as "in their first love," mean that this is a low attainment; and that they will, as a thing of course, grow "less fervent in spirit, in serving the Lord," as they get above the infancy of Christianity! When the majority in any church adopt such notions, and accustom themselves and each other to such expressions, it is a certain sign, that they will speedily provoke Christ to "remove their candlestick, unless they repent:" nay, it is the natural language of stony-ground hearers, whose joy and affection have subsided, and who, "having no root in themselves," are gradually withering away. (Note, Matt. 13:20—22. P. O. 18—23.) For, though the aged flourishing Christian may feel less vigor of affection, than he did at some times, soon after his conversion, in which novelty and self-love had no small share; yet there is far more constancy and energy in his love, influencing him to habitual self-denying obedience, and exertion in the cause of God, apart from all selfish motives, than there was before. The former resembles the transient noisy flame of thorns; the latter is like the constant, vehement, penetrating, and efficacious heat of a fire made by substantial fuel.—But in the midst of all the stratagems and open assaults of the enemy, which the traitor in the camp so often renders successful; there are some, who through faith obtain the victory; and to them Christ still "gives to eat of the Tree of Life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God."

V. 8—17.

As "the First and the Last, who was dead and is alive," is the believer's Brother and Friend; he must be rich in the deepest poverty, honorable amidst the lowest abasement, and happy under the heaviest tribulations. (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 25:34—40. John 15:12—16.) Indeed the disciples can reasonably expect no other, than to be reviled by those, who blaspheme their divine Lord, and "say that they are Christians, but are not;" and whom Christ will one day show to have been "the synagogue of Satan;" being combined together by every means to oppose his truth, and vilify and injure his faithful servants. The devil may also prevail to cast true Christians and zealous ministers into prison, or otherwise to try them, and they "may have tribulation many days:" but with such a Friend and Comforter, as "the Son of God," they ought not to "fear any of those things, which they may suffer:" their trials will be only for a limited season, and for gracious purposes; they will not be "hurt by the second death," for their enemies can only kill their bodies; and if they are enabled to be "faithful till death," the Captain of their salvation, who conquered by dying, will give them a crown of eternal life. (Notes, Matt. 10:27, 28. Rom. 8:32—39. 1 Pet. 1:6, 7.) The Christian, who thus holds fast the Lord's name, and denies not his truth, in those places where Satan peculiarly erects his throne, and at those times when his faithful witnesses are liable to be martyred in his cause, needs not fear his "sharp sword with two edges;" any more than the beloved wife need be alarmed at a sword in the hand of her affectionate husband, who yet would tremble and faint to see it in the hand of an assassin. But this confidence cannot be supported, without steady obedience: for the Lord not only hates the principles and conduct of those, who indulge avarice or sensuality, under the pretence of abounding grace and Christian liberty, and seduce others into the same abominations; but he will come quickly, and "fight with the sword of his mouth against" those bishops, pastors, and churches, who countenance them; unless they repent of their connexion with the most abhorred of his enemies, and the sanction which they give them.

V. 18—29.

Even when the Lord knows the works of his people to be wrought in love, zeal, faith, and patience, and "the last to be more than the first;" if his "eyes, which are as a flame of fire," observe that they allow among them such as teach licentiousness, and seduce his servants to commit wickedness, or to turn aside to any false worship, he will rebuke, correct, or punish them, without respect of persons, men or women, high or low, whatever influence they may possess, or however they may be gifted or distinguished. He gives them indeed "space to repent;" (Notes, Rom. 2:4—6. 2 Pet. 3:9,14—16.) but if they do not avail themselves of his long-suffering, he will surely "cast them into great tribulation;" and frequently, the remarkable sufferings, with the discoveries of the secret wickedness, of the actors in such corruptions of the gospel, even in this world, show the churches, that Christ is "He, who searcheth the reins and hearts," and establishes his counsels in wisdom and justice. This at least will be evident to the whole assembled world, when he shall come to judgment, to give unto every one of us "according to our works." Let us then avoid and protest against such perversions of Christianity; and beware of these "depths of Satan," of which they who know the least are the most happy. Let us remember, that the yoke of Christ "is easy, and his burden light;" that he lays nothing on his servants, but what is for their good, and authorizes none to add to it; and that he calls upon us "to hold fast what we have received until he come." (Notes, Matt. 23:1—4. Acts 15:7—11,22—29. Gal. 5:1—6.) When we are tempted to sin, let us recollect what consolations he has promised to the victorious combatant: and, looking to him for help, let us aspire to "the hidden manna," "the joy that a stranger intermeddeth not with," the assurance of acceptance, the Spirit of adoption, and the earnest of eternal glory. And after every victory, may we follow up our advantage against the enemy; that we may "overcome, and keep the works" of Christ "unto the end;" and at last have glory, honor, and felicity, beyond all our present conceptions. This should often be thought of, under the animating idea of receiving power and authority from the Son of God, according to what "he hath received from the Father," as the fruit of his conflicts and victories; being made partakers of his felicity, abiding for ever in his presence, and having him for our everlasting Light and Glory. (Note, 21:22—27.) Let then every one, who has an ear, attend to "what the Spirit saith unto the churches."

CHAP. III.

The epistle of Christ to the angel of the church of Sardis; consisting of reproofs, exhortations, warnings, and promises to the pious remnant, 1—6. That to the angel of the church in Philadelphia, complete with encouragement, 7—13. That to Laodicea; comprising severe rebukes of lukewarmness and spiritual pride; connected with instruction, counsels, calls to repentance, invitations, and promises, 14—22.

3 I<sup>i</sup> Remember therefore, how thou hast received and heard,<sup>k</sup> and hold fast, and<sup>l</sup> repent. If therefore thou shalt not watch,<sup>m</sup> I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not<sup>n</sup> know what hour I will come upon thee.

Note.—Sardis lay to the south of Thyatira, and was once the renowned capital of Lydia, the kingdom of Cræsus.—The epistle to the presiding pastor, and to the church, in this city, was sent as a message from him, "that hath the seven Spirits of God, and the seven stars." (Notes, 1:4—6,12—20. 2:1.) That is, it came from the divine Saviour, through whom the Holy Spirit, in the variety and abundance of his precious gifts and graces, was communicated to all the churches, and to the seven here mentioned in particular; and who was their sovereign Proprietor and Ruler. This reminded the persons addressed, from whom they must seek wisdom, strength, and grace, for those things to which he called them; and it implied a command to the ministers to "take heed to themselves and to their doctrine," and to be active and zealous in promoting a revival in the church; especially to "the angel," the bishop, or presiding minister, who, it is probable, had by his misconduct, his bad example, or want of vigilance and activity, greatly contributed to reduce the church to a very declined and withering condition. For the divine Saviour "knew their works" not to be such as he could approve. (Note, 2:2—5.) They had indeed "a name to live:" they professed the truth, and had not deviated into heresy; they possessed gifts, and had the ordinances of God regularly administered among them; and they were considered, by others, and by themselves, as vitally united to Christ, perhaps in a flourishing state: but he knew, "that they were dead." Numbers were wholly hypocrites, and "dead in sin;" others were in a very torpid, disordered, and lifeless state; and the church in general was rather a dead corpse, or a statue resembling a Christian congregation, than a company of living members of Christ's mystical body. The Lord therefore called on them, the bishop and pastors especially, to awake, and look about them; to be vigilant in guarding against the stratagems and assaults of their enemies; to be active and earnest in the duties of their several stations; and to examine carefully into the state of their souls, and into that of the church: that so they might use proper means of "strengthening the things that remained, and were ready to die;" and endeavor, in dependence on the grace of the Holy Spirit, to revive and invigorate the faith, hope, love, and spiritual affections of those who were alive to God, though in a declining state; to bring formalists to repentance and conversion; and to purge out such as were scandalous, and infectious to others. In this manner the lamp, which was ready to expire, might be made again to burn more bright; and the state of the church, which seemed like a dying man, might revive and be restored to spiritual health and vigor. For their heart-searching Lord had "not found their works perfect, or complete, before God." They were radically defective: most of them were formal and hypocritical; and the rest languid, partial, and corrupted by sinister motives and purposes. He could not, therefore, commend them, as he had done the more hearty and complete obedience and services of flourishing Christians: because they were not such before God, whatever they might appear to be in the sight of men. He therefore called on them to "remember" the favors which they had received; the advantages for religious improvement which they possessed; and the truths, precepts, and exhortations which they had heard; that they might "hold fast" pure and undefiled religion, and repent of their inconsistent and negligent conduct. But if, after this warning, they did not become more vigilant, sober, zealous, and diligent; he assured them, that he would come, with some unexpected, surprising, and terrible judgments, without any further intimation of his purpose, till they were suddenly overwhelmed by it.—He that hath the seven spirits of God. (1) This accords with the several texts, in which our Lord promises to send the Holy Spirit to his disciples: but who is he that has the Spirit of God and sends him to men, even as he himself was sent by the Father?—Art dead.] *Notes, Luke 15:22—24. 5 He t that overcometh, u the same shall be clothed in white raiment: x and I will not blot out his name out of y the book of life, but I will z confess his name before my Father, and before his angels.

6 He a that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

[Practical Observations.]
Note.—Even at Sardis there were a few Christians, whose names would be at length mentioned with distinguished honor, on account of their holy singularity: as they had not "defiled their garments," or disgraced their profession by the worldly lusts and sinful practices, to which the rest were addicted. And Christ assured them, that they "should walk with him in white," the emblem of perfect purity, triumph and joy; and so be his accepted, holy, and honored companions, in heavenly felicity. (Notes, 6:9—11. 7:9—17. 19:7,8,11—16. Esth. 8:15. Ec. 9:7—9.)—"For they were worthy," or meet and proper persons, to be admitted to that glorious and happy state, having approved themselves to be his faithful friends and servants, whilst they lived on earth. (Note, 2 Thes. 1:5—10.) In short, to every conqueror in the spiritual warfare, at a place especially where temptations and bad examples so much abounded, the Lord promised, "that he should be clothed in white raiment," as completely and eternally justified, sanctified, and made glorious in the presence and favor of God. (Note, Eph. 5:22—27.) Neither would "he blot the name" of any such person "out of the book of life," in which his chosen and accepted servants are registered; even, though the corrupt church to which he belonged should be given up; though numbers of those, who had "a name to live," and were deemed heirs of heaven, were left to apostatize, or to be rejected as hypocrites; and though the Christian himself might often have fears of this kind amidst his conflicts and temptations. On the contrary, Christ would surely confess his name, as one of his friends and brethren, at the last day, before his eternal Father and all his holy angels. (Notes, Matt. 10:32,33. 25:34—40. Luke 12:8—10. John 6:36—40. 10:26—31.)—All this related to other bishops, pastors, and churches also, who were, or should hereafter be placed in similar circumstances.—This once flourishing city now lies in ruins: a few persons called Christians are found there; but they are reduced to the most abject slavery, and have neither church nor minister among them.—Blot, &c. (5) *Notes, Ex. 32:30—33. “the key of David, f he that openeth, and no man shutteth; and shutteth, and no man openeth;

Note.—Philadelphia lay to the south-east of Sardis.—The epistle to the angel of the church in that city, was sent in the name of “Him that is holy,” and of “Him that is true,” or of “the Holy One, and the True One:” which words contain a very conclusive proof of the Deity of Christ; for what mere creature can with propriety speak of himself in this language? (Notes, 4:6–8. 6:9–11. 15:1–4. Is. 6:1–4. 30:8–14. 57:15,16.) It was also sent in the name of him, “that hath the key of David.” (1:18. Notes, 8,9. 5:1–10. Is. 22:20–25.) Being the promised Son of David, according to the flesh, and the King of the true Israel to all generations, he has the absolute power to open the gate of mercy to whom he pleases; to open the kingdom of heaven to the souls of his people, when removed by death; and to open their graves, and bring forth their bodies glorious and immortal, that they may be reunited to their souls in everlasting felicity: and on the other hand to shut out, and exclude from mercy, and from heaven, whom he will, and to shut them up in hell; nor can any resistance be made to his power, or any appeal from his decision. He has likewise power to “open the understanding” and the heart, or judicially to close them; to “open a door” for the preaching of his gospel, or for the deliverance of his servants out of trouble: and when in these or any other instances he opens, no one, either man or angel, can shut; when he shuts, no creature can possibly open. (Notes, 8,9. 5:1–10. Job 11:7–12. 12:13–25. 34:20–30. Matt. 16:19. Gal. 3:19–25.)

8 I know thy works: behold, I have set before thee <sup>h</sup> an open door, and no man can shut it: for thou hast <sup>i</sup> a little strength, <sup>k</sup> and hast kept my word, <sup>l</sup> and hast not denied my name.

9 Behold, I will make them of <sup>m</sup> the synagogue of Satan, which say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie; behold, <sup>n</sup> I will make them to come and worship before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee.

Note.—The holy, faithful, and sovereign Lord and Saviour above mentioned, “knew the works” of his presiding pastor, ministers, and disciples, at Philadelphia; and they were such as he graciously approved: they might, therefore, for their encouragement be assured, that, by his gospel, and the means of grace afforded them, he had “set before them an open door” of access into the family and kingdom of God, and to all the present and everlasting privileges of his people, which no creature could shut against them; or, as some explain it, he had set before them an open door of usefulness, in spreading his gospel, nor could any one prevent the success of their “work and labor of love” for that purpose. (Note, 7.) For though this church seems not to have been so eminent as some others, for numbers, and gifts, and ability of every kind; yet they “had a little strength:” they were upright in their profession of the gospel; they had some vigor of faith and holy affection, and were zealously using their little influence to promote the success of Christianity. They had also “kept the word of Christ;” having adhered to his truths, commands, and institutions, in faith, obedience, and steadfastness; neither had they denied their relations and obligations to him, or acted to the dishonour of his name, notwithstanding fears and dangers. (Note, 2:10,11.) For they likewise were exposed to persecution, from some who professed to be the people of God; but whom Christ disowned, and declared to be “liars, and the synagogue of Satan:” and he promised that he would at length constrain these opposers to come and pay court to them, in the most submissive manner, prostrating themselves at their feet, and supplicating their favor, as convinced of his love to them. (Notes, Ex. 11:8. 12:29–36. Esth. 8:17. Is. 49:22, 23. 60:10–14. Zech. 8:20–23.)—Perhaps the unexpected success of the gospel, in Philadelphia and the neighborhood, rendered the Christians so powerful, that the Jews and their adherents were glad to seek their protection, from the rage of the multitude; by which vast numbers of them were frequently massacred in those turbulent times. The language leads us also to conclude, that many were converted to Christianity by means of those events. Some indeed think, that Judaizing Christians were meant; but it is far more natural to understand the word “Jews” in its ordinary sense; and to consider them as open opposers, rather than as false professors of the gospel.

Note.—As the bishop, pastors, and church at Philadelphia had kept the word of Christ, in that constancy and patience which he had commanded and exemplified; (Notes, Heb. 12: 2,3. 1 Pet. 4:1,2.) and had, by his grace, been enabled to stand their ground, and to “deny themselves, take up their cross, and follow him:” he promised to keep them “from the hour of temptation.” This relates to some remarkable season of persecution, heresy, or apostasy, which was about to come on all the churches in the world, especially through the whole Roman empire, to try and prove the sincerity and strength of their faith and love.

On this trying occasion, the Lord Jesus would shelter the church at Philadelphia from the fury of the storm, and not let them be so sharply tried or tempted, as other churches were; which might, in some respects, have more strength, but had also more need of correction, and of being proved and purified. It is generally supposed to refer to Trajan's persecution, which was more general and violent, than the persecutions under Nero and Domitian. But, as this city was the last of all the seven, which was taken by the Mohammedans; and as there has been a succession of Christians there, in every generation to this time; some have applied this to their preservation from that awful delusion, which almost extirpated Christianity in those regions.—It is indeed to be feared, that the professed Christians at Philadelphia, have at present but little of the power of godliness: yet we may hope, that Christ has had a few real disciples in every age, and has some even at present, in this city.—The Lord next called the attention of the persons concerned to the assurance, that he "was coming quickly," to try his professed people; to deliver such as were faithful; to destroy their enemies, or to judge the world. (Notes, 1:7. 22:6,7,18—21. Heb. 10:35—39. Jam. 5:7—11.) He, therefore, commanded them "to hold fast" the truth which they had received, and to maintain the ground which they had got; that no one might, through their dread of trials and sufferings, deprive them of the victor's crown, for which they were contending; or take away that distinguished honor, which this commendation conferred on them; for this could not be preserved without vigilance, diligence, and persevering courage. (Notes, 2:24—28. 2 John 7—11.)—The captivity or ruin of the seven churches of Asia "was consummated," [viz. by the Ottomans,] A. D. 1312; and the barbarous lords of Ionia and Lydia still trample on the monuments of classic and Christian antiquity. In the loss of Ephesus, the Christians deplored the fall of the first angel, the extinction of the first candlestick of the Revelation: the desolation is complete; and the temple of Diana, or the church of Mary, will equally elude the search of the curious traveller. The circus, and three stately theatres, of Laodicea, are now peopled with wolves and foxes; Sardis is reduced to a miserable village; the god of Mohammed, without a rival, ... is invoked in the mosques of Thyatira and Pergamos; and the populousness of Smyrna is supported by the foreign trade of the Franks and Armenians. Philadelphia alone has been saved by prophecy, or courage. (Such is the insidious language of this infidel writer, who sneers at the prophecy, while he records its accomplishment!) 'At a distance from the sea, forgotten by the emperors, encompassed on all sides by the Turks, her valiant sons defended their religion and freedom, above fourscore years, and at length capitulated with the proudest of the Ottomans. Among the Greek colonies, and churches of Asia, Philadelphia is still erect; a column in a scene of ruins, a pleasing example that the paths of honor and safety

'may sometimes be the same.' Gibbon.—Some readers may need to be informed, that Gibbon wrote a much admired history of 'the decline of the Roman empire,' in which he has, with great skill, infused an abundant proportion of infidelity and impiety, in a peculiarly plausible and imposing manner.

12 Him that <sup>x</sup>overcometh will I make a <sup>y</sup>pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out: and <sup>z</sup>I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of <sup>a</sup>the city of my God, which is new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: and I will write upon him <sup>b</sup>my new name.

13 He <sup>c</sup>that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—To animate the Christians at Philadelphia, and all others, to the spiritual conflict, our Lord next promised to make every conqueror "a pillar in the temple of his God;" to establish him as an ornamental part, essential part of the spiritual edifice, which he, as Mediator, was building to the glory of his God and Father: that, being consecrated to him, and placed in the sanctuary above, he might conduce to the beauty, proportion, and magnificence of the whole; and be for ever most honorable and blessed, as "an habitation of God through the Spirit;" without any fear of being separated from him, or deprived of his favor and presence for ever. (Notes, Eph. 2:19—22. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.) Upon this pillar, he promised "to write the name of his God;" that all might know to whom it belonged, and to whose glory it was erected; according to the custom of inscribing, on stately columns, the name and exploits of the person, to whose memory they were dedicated. He would also write on it, "the name of the city of his God;" (the God whom he, Christ, in human nature, worshipped and served: Note, John 20:11—17.) this is called the new Jerusalem; it is of heavenly original, and derives its glory from the presence of God in it. (Notes, 21: Gal. 4:21—31.) Thus all would know to what city the Victor belonged, and that he was entitled to all its privileges for evermore. The Lord promised also to write upon him "his own new name;" even that of Emmanuel, Jesus, the Redeemer of sinners, which he has newly assumed in addition to his former titles, of Creator, Upholder, and Lord of all worlds. Thus he would own him as one of his chosen people; a trophy of his victory over the world, sin, Satan, and death; and a monument erected to the power of his arm, the truth of his word, the efficacy of his atonement and mediation, and the unsearchable riches of his grace. In these declarations all bishops, pastors, and churches, yea all professed Christians, in every age and nation, are interested, according to the difficulty and completeness of their victory.

Note.—Laodicea lay to the south of Philadelphia, and in the road from that city to Ephesus: for the seven churches were situated in a kind of circle; and the progressive journey from one to another of them, in rotation, might be made in the order of these epistles.—A flourishing church had been planted at Laodicea, in the time of the apostle Paul: (Notes, Col. 2:1—4. 4:15,16.) but it had greatly declined before this epistle was sent thither. The Lord Jesus ordered it to be written in the name of “The AMEN;” of Him who is Truth in himself, and who will surely confirm and ratify all his words, which are established, and unchangeable like his own nature. (Notes, Is. 65:16. 2 Cor. 1:17—20.) For he is “the faithful and true Witness,” most exactly testifying the nature, truths, purposes, and will of God to man, and bearing witness most impartially for or against the conduct and characters of his professed servants, and of all his creatures. (Notes, 1:4—6. Is. 55:4.) He sent to the Laodiceans also, under the title of “the Beginning of the creation of God,” or the Origin, Author, and Ruler of the whole universe, who has authority and power to dispose of all things as he sees good. (Note, Col. 1:15—17.) This glorious Lord of all “knew their works” to be such, as were utterly unworthy of his approbation; for they were “neither cold nor hot;” they neither wholly cast off all regard to the gospel; nor yet were they zealous, fervent, and diligent in religion. He therefore declared, that “he would they were cold or hot;” he desired, (speaking after the manner of men, expressing their utter dislike to any one’s conduct,) that they would either renounce their profession, and cease from the worthless form of attending on his ordinances; or that they would show a becoming earnestness in those things, which pertained to his service and glory. For, while they were called by his name, and reluctantly performed a scanty measure of external duties, with an evident indifference and weariness in them; their evil tempers, unholy actions, and attachment to the world, and to its pleasures, company, and interests, dishonored him more than their apostacy could do; and in the event, it would be equally fatal to their own souls. Because in this manner they would give numbers an unfavorable opinion of Christianity, as if it had been an unholy religion: while others would conclude that it could afford no real satisfaction; otherwise its professors would not have been so heartless in it, or so ready to seek pleasure or happiness from the world; or that it was not of much value, seeing they would not give up any thing of supposed value for the sake of it.—In short, professed Christians of this character are traitors in the camp, who are always more dangerous than open enemies; or wicked servants, who disgrace and rob their masters more, than they can do after they quit, or are turned out of, the family.—Unless, therefore, they became more “fervent in spirit, in serving the Lord;” he was determined to show his contempt and abhorrence of them, by rejecting them; even as a man, whose stomach nauseates water which is lukewarm, casts it out of his mouth with loathing and disgust. (Notes, Jer. 14:19—22. 15:1—4. Zech. 11:7—9.)

Note.—While the state of the Laodicean church was so lamentably declined, that very few real Christians, and those of very small proficiency, remained in it; the spiritual pride and self-confidence of the presiding minister, the pastors and people, had proportionably increased! and this gave occasion to the following reproof, instruction, and counsel. They were ready to say within themselves, to each other, and even in a boasting manner to their neighbors, that “they were rich” in spiritual gifts and attainments; that they were “increased in goods,” and had obtained a larger measure of every spiritual gift and endowment, than they formerly had, even when the apostles were with them. (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:8—13. 5:1—5.) They thought indeed, they had need of nothing; but were complete in knowledge, wisdom, goodness, strength, and establishment in the privileges and liberty of the gospel; like poor lunatics, who fancy every house and estate, which they see or hear of, to be their own.—Thus they preferred themselves to others; and, being proud in spirit, instead of “poor in spirit,” they could only pray in the Pharisee’s manner; (Note, Luke 18:9—14.) and were utterly incapable of the life of faith in Christ for all things pertaining to salvation. For they “knew not that they were wretched and miserable,” in a most abject, perilous, and perishing condition, and utterly destitute of wisdom and grace: not only poor, as all natural men are, but poor as professors of the gospel; being Pharisees upon evangelical principles; and proud of their attainments in Christianity, when in fact most of them were wholly unconverted. This delusion took place because they were "blind;" they had only that "knowledge which puffeth up;" but they had never seen the real glory of God in Christ, the evil of sin, their own exceeding sinfulness, the deceitfulness of their hearts, or the excellency of the gospel. (Notes, John 9:39—41. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. 2 Pet. 1:8,9.) They therefore continued "naked," though they knew it not; being neither covered with the justifying righteousness of Christ, nor adorned by his grace.—The original is peculiarly emphatical; for the article is prefixed to the first epithet, so that the passage may be thus rendered, "Thou art the wretched one, the miserable one, &c." and thus alone were they distinguished from all the other churches.

19 As<sup>c</sup> many as I love, I rebuke and chasten: d be zealous therefore, e and repent.

Note.—The case, described in the preceding verse, was that of the church in general, and of its bishop, pastors, and members in particular, by the testimony even of "the Searcher of all hearts!" yet he counselled them "to buy of him" those things, of which they were in such urgent need. They could have them from no other in the world; and he sold them to the poorest, who applied for them, "without money and without price." (Note, Is. 55:1—3.) Even such wretched and indigent sinners as they were might obtain these invaluable blessings; yet, much of what they valued, though worthless in itself, must be renounced in order to appropriate them, and hence it might properly be called "buying" them. (Notes, Matt. 13:44—46. Phil. 3:8—11.) They were therefore "counselled," (and the counsels of Christ are commands, invitations, and promises,) to apply to him for "gold tried in the fire, that they might be rich." This denotes that true and precious faith and grace, which in numberless instances has endured the hottest fire of persecution without being consumed, and has been rendered more resplendent by the flames; and which proves most advantageous in affliction, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment. This would make them "rich" in reality, as it would ensure and evidence their interest in "the unsearchable riches of Christ," and in all the promises given through him to his people. (Notes, Eph. 3:8. 2 Pet. 1:3,4.) He advised them also to buy of him "white raiment, that they might be clothed, and that the shame of their nakedness might not appear;" for as "their own righteousnesses were as filthy rags," and their profession of Christianity hypocritical; so they must soon be exposed and put to shame before men and angels, unless they had his righteousness put on them, for "a robe of salvation," and were made holy by his sanctifying Spirit. (Notes, 4—6. 16:12—16. Gen. 2:25. 3:7—11. Hos. 2:2—5.) But as their pride and self-confidence had blinded them to the truth of their case and character, and consequently to the value of these blessings; so Christ directed them to "anoint their eyes with eye-salve, that they might see;" let them examine themselves by the rule of his word, and pray earnestly for the teaching of his Holy Spirit, to purge away their pride, prejudices, and worldly lusts; that they might learn their own real character and situation, and the nature and preciousness of his salvation, and value it in a more suitable manner. (Notes, 17. John 16:8—11,14,15. Rom. 11:16—21.)—These warnings and exhortations were not given them in indignation, but in mercy; for it was the general rule of his conduct, to "rebuke and chasten those whom he loved;" (Notes, Heb. 12:4—11.) and they might consider these rebukes as tokens of his favor; for such they would prove if properly attended to. It behoved them, therefore, to be very zealous and earnest in these most important concerns; especially in repenting, renouncing, cleansing away, and seeking forgiveness of the evils into which they had fallen. (Note, 2:2—5.)

Note.—To encourage the repentance, and excite the earnestness, of the lukewarm Laodiceans, the Lord called on them to notice, with admiration, his condescension, patience, and grace; that, while they were so wanting in love to him, he stood waiting "at the door," and seeking to be re-admitted into the church, and into their hearts, from whence their sins had driven him. He stood without, "knocking," by the dispensations of his providence, the warnings and instructions of his Spirit; and thus requiring them to receive and entertain him. (Notes, Cant. 5:2—8.) Nay, though the church should not admit him; yet, if any individual among them was willing to "open," and give up his heart and affections to him, in order that he might destroy his enemies and rivals, cast out idols, subdue all iniquities, and "make all things new;" he would certainly "enter in," and take such delight in the work of his grace, and communicate such blessings and consolations to the soul of that man, that it might be said, "he supped with him, and he with him;" such intimate communion should be thenceforth maintained between redeemed sinners and their most gracious Saviour! (Notes, 5:1. Cant. 6:1—3. Matt. 26:29. Luke 12:35—46. 22:24—30.)—He graciously condescends to "sup with them" now, and he will take them to "sup with him" hereafter, and that for ever.—(Note, 19:9,10.)—In short, to every conqueror over such strong temptations as the Laodiceans were exposed to, the Lord promised a blessing proportioned to the difficulty of the conflict: for he engaged to "grant him to sit with him in his throne;" and by an inconceivable union and fellowship with him in all his glory, and an interest in all the benefits of his mediatorial authority and power, to possess an honor and felicity which can never be explained or conceived, except by those who experience it. For as these victors would be first conformed to Christ in conflict, self-denial, and suffering, so would they at last be conformed to him in victory and exaltation; being "seated with him in his throne," even "as he overcame and was set down with his Father in his throne." The same inexpressible dignity would also be bestowed on other conquerors in like difficult circumstances, for the warnings and instructions were intended for the benefit of all who heard them, in every age and nation.—The ruins of this city show that it once was most magnificent; but at present no human creature dwells there. So that the state of these seven cities, both respecting Christianity, and their outward prosperity, exactly accords to the commendation or rebuke, which were given to the churches established there, by the Spirit of prophecy, above seventeen hundred years ago! which remarkable coincidence contains an instructive lesson, and a solemn warning to all other cities and nations favored with the gospel, and to their rulers ecclesiastical and civil, not to neglect or trifle with so great a blessing.—Nothing, in these short epistles, is said, concerning distinct congregations in any of the cities mentioned; though some time before, there were several elders (πρεσβυτεροι, or επισκοποι) at Ephesus: on the other hand, nothing is introduced respecting any dependent churches in the neighboring towns, or villages, as under the authority of the angel, or presiding minister, in each of these churches. Hence it appears, that men of discordant sentiments, on the subject of ecclesiastical government, in vain attempt to support their several systems, in every part, by this portion of scripture.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When he, who has "the fullness of the Spirit," and who rules over all means and instruments, reproves, counsels, or commands; his words imply the promise of al: redful assistance, to those who obediently attend to them. But how many professed Christians does that heart-searching Judge, who "knoweth our works," behold, "who have a name that they live," and perhaps much celebrity in the church, and "yet are dead in trespasses and sins!" Alas! it is to be feared, that in some cases both national establishments, regularly constituted, with rulers and teachers; but many more select religious societies, who have exact forms and notions, and who profess the truths of the gospel with some reputation, consist almost entirely of such persons, and have very little vital godliness among them. We should, therefore, be very diligent and impartial in examining ourselves by the rules of scripture; very earnest in prayer to the Lord to show us what we are; and very careful not to rest satisfied with the opinion of men, even of the wisest and most discerning of the human race, respecting us.—When it is evident, that we, or the society to which we belong, have declined, in respect to vital godliness; we should spare no pains, and neglect no means, which may "strengthen the things that remain, and are ready to die;" for the heart-searching Saviour often judges those works, not to be sound and upright before God, which men admire and applaud: and our great concern is with our Judge, not with our fellow-subjects, or fellow-criminals.—In seeking a revival, in our own souls, or in those of others, it is incumbent on us, "to remember what we have received and heard;" that, by comparing our advantages and profession with our proficiency, we may be humbled and quickened; and so excited "to hold fast" what we retain, and to "repent and do our first works."—But if men will despise warnings to "watch and pray;" Christ will surely come, when they do not expect him, and appoint such slothful servants their portion among his enemies.—Yet, even in very corrupt churches, he has commonly "a few names, who have not defiled their garments;" and if our lot be cast in such a situation, we should be ambitious of this true honor; that, amidst numerous bad examples, and strong temptations, we may be found "a peculiar people, zealous of good works." At present we may indeed be hated, or derided, for this holy singularity of conduct; but the Lord will admit us to the honor of "walking with him in white," as graciously accounted worthy of so great a felicity; when all unbelievers and formal professors shall have their portion in the blackness of eternal darkness. (Notes, 2 Pet. 2:17. Jude 11—13.) For, whether few or many overcome the peculiar temptations of their situation, they, and they only, will be accepted and triumphant at the last: not one of them shall have his "name blotted out of the book of life;" nor will the divine Saviour refuse to confess the meaneast of their names, "before his Father and all his holy angels."

V. 7—13.

It is incumbent on us to attend to him, "who is Holy and True," who hates sin, yet performs his largest promises to believing sinners: he reigns on the throne of David; he "opens" the gates of life and death, of heaven and hell, and none can shut them; "he shutteth and none can open." Whether, therefore, "he set before us an open door" of access to his mercy-seat, or afford us an opportunity of usefulness; no created being can shut us out from it. Even if we have but "little strength," yet if we have "kept his word, and have not denied him," amidst fears and discouragements; he will not let any enemy prevail against us: and as he has all hearts in his hands, so he often disposes the opposers of his people to show them respect, to desire their friendship, to own that he has loved them, or gladly to receive the truth from them. (Note, Gen. 50:15—20.)—If we would escape those severe corrections and violent temptations, which, from time to time, are permitted to try the churches throughout the earth; we must patiently adhere to the truth and will of Christ; and shrink from no cross, with which we meet, when following his example: for an unwatchful conduct makes way for temptation, and unfits men to resist it. (Note, Matt. 26:40,41.) While, therefore, we wait for him who "cometh quickly," we should "hold fast the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end;" that none may rob us of "our crown," or even of the comfortable assurance of obtaining it. For those who overcome, in the strength and after the example of Christ, shall be placed by him as pillars in the temple above, to go no more out; and they shall for ever enjoy all the privileges and the felicity of the city of God, to the glory of the Father, and that of the eternal Son, who has redeemed them with his precious blood; that they may forever show forth his praise, and enjoy his love. (Notes, ̅1:22—27 John 17:24. 2 Thes. 1:11,12.)

While we bow our ear to the encouraging topics of the gospel, let us advert also to the language of "the Amen, the true and faithful Witness," the Origin and Ruler of the "creation of God," whilst he speaks of the character and doom of lukewarm Christians. Alas! how many are there of the Laodicean stamp in every place! Did we suppose these epistles to be prophetic, as to the church in general, we might be induced to conclude, that the end of the world was nigh: for amidst the abounding of iniquity and infidelity, "the love of many waxes cold;" and the state of religion, (Note, Matt. 24:9—14.) even in this highly favored nation, too much resembles that of this seventh church. The Lord knows, that very many professors of evangelical doctrine at present are "neither cold nor hot;" except as their indifference in essential matters is strangely counterpoised by a hot and fiery spirit of disputation about things of far inferior moment! No doubt the Laodicean state of the Christian churches, in most parts of the world, is one grand hindrance, nay, the grand hindrance of all, to the propagation of the gospel among the nations; who can scarcely conceive, that religion to be from heaven, the professors of which are so "earthly, sensual, devilish;" and certainly the state of those who "hold the truth," too often "in unrighteousness," and generally in a lukewarm manner, forms one grand objection and prejudice against the gospel, in the minds of numbers in this land; and gives moral and devent Infidels, Socinians, and Arians, their chief advantage against us. Yet the persons, who are chiefly reprehensible, are least likely to regard such admonitions: for whilst the Lord is saying, "I would thou wert cold or hot; but because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth;" they are boasting "that they are rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing!" It is indeed a general rule, that professors of religion grow proud, in proportion as they become car-nal and formal: for, like glow-worms, they shine most in the dark, according to their apprehensions of themselves, and their commendations of one another. The Pharisaical spirit is indeed always odious and dangerous; whilst it renders men ignorant of their wretchedness, poverty, nakedness, and blindness, and insensible of the preciousness of Christ and his salvation: yet the legal Pharisee is a hopeful character, compared with those, who graft the Pharisee on an evangelical profession, and strangely connect it with Antinonian principles and laxity of morals! The gracious Saviour, however, still continues to declare to all men their lost estate: and he mercifully counsels, even lukewarm and proud professors of the gospel, as well as others, to come and buy of him unsearchable and never failing treasures, unfading robes of righteousness, and that heavenly unction, which renders the most ignorant "wise unto eternal salvation." Happy are they, who take his counsel! for all others must perish in their sins. Even when he enforces his neglected counsels and invitations, with sharp rebukes and painful corrections; (which he will do in respect of as many as he loves; Note, 1 Cor. 11:29—34.) if we be thus made zealous and penitent, we shall deem them additional and most precious favors. May we then hear the voice of his word and his rod, while, with infinite compassion and condescension, he continues to stand waiting and knocking at the door of our hearts; that he may enter in, and bring salvation with him. Let us earnestly beseech him to put forth his almighty power, and thus break down all obstacles to his own admission; and so take entire possession of our whole souls: that we may be ashamed of our folly and ingratitude in allowing any creature to rival him in our affections, or attempting to divide our hearts between him and worldly objects. Then we may hope, that he will communicate his consolations to us, "fill us with peace and joy in believing, and cause us to abound in hope by the power of the Holy Spirit;" that he will "delight over us to do us good," and cause us to glory in him: and that, by his help, and under his banner, we shall conquer every enemy: till our blessed experience explains to us, that which we cannot possibly before understand, even what is meant by our "sitting down with him on his throne, even as he overcame, and is set down with the Father upon his throne."

CHAP. IV.

John, in vision, beholds heaven opened, and the glory of God, as seated on an exalted throne, 1—5; surrounded by twenty-four elders, and four living creatures, who unite in adoring Him, as the Creator and Lord of all, 4—11.

AFTER this I looked, and, behold, <sup>b</sup>a door was opened in heaven: and <sup>c</sup>the first voice which I heard was as it were of a trumpet talking with me; which said, <sup>d</sup> Come up hither, <sup>e</sup> and I will show thee things which must be hereafter.

2 And immediately <sup>f</sup> I was in the Spirit: and, behold <sup>g</sup> a throne was set in heaven, <sup>h</sup> and one sat on the throne.

3 And he that sat was to look upon <sup>i</sup> like a jasper and a sardine-stone: and there was <sup>k</sup> a rainbow round about the throne, in sight <sup>l</sup> like unto an emerald.

Note.—When the Lord Jesus had dictated to his apostle the preceding epistles, and thus instructed him to write “the things which then were;” a short interruption of his visions seems to have taken place. But afterwards, looking and waiting for further discoveries, he beheld “a door opened in heaven,” the holy habitation of God; and then another vision was introduced, which made way for his being shown “things which must be hereafter.” (Note, 1:12—20.) For this chapter and the next constitute an introduction to the prophetic part of the book, especially to the “opening of the seals,” in the sixth and seventh chapters.—While he was contemplating the “door opened in heaven,” he heard a voice, as before, calling him to come up thither; and immediately he was “in the Spirit.” (Note, 1:9—11.) It is not to be supposed, that any external objects were presented to the senses of the prophets, on such occasions: but, the natural use of all their faculties being suspended, their minds were supernaturally impressed with the ideas of such things, as were particularly suited to illustrate the subjects, which they were employed to reveal. (Notes, Ez. 1:1—3. 8:1—4. 11:22—25. Acts 22:17—21. 2 Cor. 12:1—6.) It should not therefore be supposed, that the objects, afterwards mentioned, have a real existence in heaven: but they were visionary emblems, suited to give proper instruction to the apostle, and to his readers: and the chief business of the expositor is to develop the meaning of them, and, as it were, to read the hieroglyphics. “Being in the Spirit,” and cast into an ecstasy, or trance, we may suppose that John did not well know “whether he were in the body, or out of the body:” He was, however, as to his own apprehension, admitted into the immediate presence of God, and had the vision of a glorious throne, on which One sat, whom he did not attempt to describe. This was emblematical of the universal, absolute, and eternal dominion of  $\text{JEHOVAH}$ ; and of his exaltation far above all creatures, as their great Creator and Sovereign Lord. (Notes, 4—11. 5: 7:9—17. Is. 6:1—4. Ez. 1:26—23.) The visible glory, (which seems to have had some reference to the glory above the mercy-seat in the holy of holies, as there is throughout these visions an allusion to the temple, its furniture, and services.) being resplendent like the “jasper,” might be emblematical of the perfect purity and excellency of the divine nature; and its color like the red sardine stone, might represent his awful justice and fiery indignation. “The rainbow” was a well known emblem of the covenant of grace; (Notes, Gen. 9:9—17. Is. 54: 6—10.) and, its surrounding the throne denoted, that the holiness and justice of God, and all his dispensations as the Sovereign of all worlds, had respect to his covenant of peace and engagements of love, which he had ratified to his believing people; and that it harmonized with them. In this rainbow, the soft green of the emerald was predominant: which perhaps might imply, that as the green relieves the eye, which some other colors fatigue and dazzle, so the discovery made of the mercy of God in the covenant of grace refreshes the believer’s mind, which the display of his glorious power, holiness, and justice would otherwise dismay and confound. On these subjects, the author writes with great diffidence. He conceives, that all the scriptural emblems have some distinct meaning, especially those of this book: but whether he has pointed out that meaning, or not, in general, and in particular instances, forms another question.—A door opened. (1) Note, 3:7. 5:1—10.

5 And out of the throne <sup>q</sup> proceeded lightnings and thunderings and voices: and there were <sup>r</sup> seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are <sup>s</sup> the seven Spirits of God.

Note.—Round about, at some distance from the exalted throne of God, were placed twenty-four thrones, of an inferior order, on which were seated twenty-four elders. These are generally allowed to have been the emblematic representatives of the whole church of God, both under the old and the new dispensation. The thrones on which they sat, their white raiment, (Note, 3: 4—6.) and their crowns of gold, implied their acceptance, sanctification, and royal priesthood. (Note, 1:4—6.) For, though the church militant was thus represented, as well as the church triumphant; yet the whole was described with relation to the security of the state of true Christians, their glorious privileges, and the honor to which the Lord purposed to advance them. The number of these elders may refer to the twenty-four courses, into which the priests were divided; (Notes, 1 Chr. 24:) or to the twelve patriarchs, and twelve apostles, as the heads of the old and the new Testament churches. “The lightnings, thunders, and voices,” which proceeded from the throne, according to the awful scene exhibited on mount Sinai, might imply, that God was as terrible as ever to the impenitent and unbelieving. (Notes, 8:1—6. 11:19. Ex. 19:16—25. Heb. 12:18—21.)—The “seven lamps of fire, burning before the throne,” were emblematical of “the seven Spirits of God,” or the manifold gifts and graces communicated to all Christians by the baptism of the Holy Spirit and of fire. (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, 1:4—6. Matt. 3:11,12.)

Note.—The “sea of glass, clear as crystal,” being perfectly pure and transparent, (perhaps in allusion to the molten sea of brass in the court of the temple,) seems to refer to the “Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness,” in which all the spiritual priesthood must wash, previously to their acceptable spiritual sacrifices. (Note, 15:1—4. Ex. 30:18—21. 1 Kings 7:23—39. Zech. 13:1.) Various opinions have been held concerning “the four beasts,” or “living creatures;” as it certainly ought to have been translated, in order to adhere to the exact meaning of the original, and to preserve the truth of the emblem. The unaccountable notion, that the Trinity of Persons in the Godhead was represented by them, while two emblems were given of the Son, because of his incarnation and sacrifice, can have no other support, than the names which have sanctioned it; for this plain reason; that “these living creatures” are, throughout, represented as the principal worshippers, not as the Object of worship. Nor can the far more general and plausible opinion, that they were representatives of the angels, as the cherubim in Ezekiel’s vision evidently were, be supported by any sufficient proof: (Notes, Ex. 1:5—14. 10:1,2.) Angels indeed are personally introduced, in the subsequent part of this vision; but “these living creatures” are spoken of, as adoring “the Lamb that was slain, who had redeemed them to God with his blood.” (Note, 5:8—10.) They must therefore, undeniably, represent some part of the church of redeemed sinners, of the human race. Perceiving this, some expositors have supposed them to be representatives of the whole church, and the twenty-four elders of its rulers and pastors: but it is surely far more reasonable to reverse this arrangement, and to conclude that “the four living creatures” represent a part, the twenty-four elders the whole, of the church, than that the larger number should represent only a part, and the smaller the whole. In short, it seems evident that they were emblems of the true ministers of Christianity, in the different parts of the earth, through successive generations.—Ezekiel, being about to predict providential dispensations respecting the nation of Israel, had a vision emblematical of the ministry of angels, by which those events would be accomplished: but John’s predictions relating chiefly to the church in the different regions of the earth, and to the affairs of nations only in subserviency to it, he had a vision emblematical of the ministers of religion, by whom the interests of the church would principally be maintained. As the heavenly temper of mind, and the spiritual endowments which qualify men for this arduous work, accord in great measure, though in a far lower degree, to the affections and endowments of angels; it is not at all wonderful to find a coincidence in the hieroglyphics, by which they were represented. But each cherub, in Ezekiel’s vision, had four faces; while John’s “living creatures” had the same four appearances, divided among them: for angels may be supposed to possess singly the several excellencies, which are given to many of the most eminent ministers.—In various particulars, the emblem teaches what true and able ministers are and do; and thus it serves to instruct and remind them of their important duties. “The lion” is the known emblem of courage and magnanimity: “the calf,” or young ox, of strength, hardness, and patient endurance of labor: “the human face” is the emblem of prudence, benevolence, and compassion: and “the eagle” of penetration, soaring beyond earthly things, contemplation of heavenly objects, and “affections fixed on things above.” The six wings denote alacrity, humility, promptitude, and speed in the Lord’s work. These “living creatures” were also “full of eyes” before, behind, and within; which aptly represented vigilance, circumspection, attention to their work and charge, watchful and cautious observance of the motions and stratagems of their enemies, self-acquaintance, and jealous diligence in searching their own hearts, and taking heed to their own spirits. Their unceasing and unwearied worship of the Lord, day and night, may signify, that, through their instructions, exhortations, example, and assistance, converted sinners, in every part of the earth, from age to age, are continually blessing and glorifying God, and worshipping at his mercy-seat: and the three-fold repetition of the word holy, (as in the worship of the seraphim, in the above cited passage in Isaiah,) might be an intimation of the Trinity of persons in the Godhead; to which respect was had, which Person soever was immediately addressed. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

The Lord Jesus, ‘having overcome the sharpness of death, hath opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers;’ and if we look unto him by faith, and obediently attend to his voice, whilst he calls us to “set our affections on things above;” we shall, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, behold the glory of our reconciled God upon his “throne of grace;” be encouraged by the engagements of his everlasting covenant, and draw nigh in humble boldness with our worship; notwithstanding the terrors of his justice, and the awful curses of his broken law. For blessed are all they who belong to his church, in heaven, or on earth. Great is the honor and dignity conferred on them, or prepared for them; yea, far greater than all the thrones, sceptres, diadems, or triumphs, which have excited the ambition or envy of mankind in every age and place; and which have been sought by furious contests, and most horrible crimes, and through seas of human blood.—But our conflicts are of a more benign and benevolent kind, though generally requiring much self-denial and patience. If, however, we are baptized with the illuminating, purifying, and transforming influences of the Holy Spirit, washed in the pure fountain of the Redeemer’s blood, and clothed in the sacerdotal robe of his righteousness; we shall ere long have done with conflict and suffering, receive the victor’s honorable crown, and join in the rapturous adoration of the heavenly worshippers. (Note, 7:13—17. P. O. 9—17.)

Here on earth the Lord conducts the affairs of his church by his ministers, whom he has brought nearer to him than their brethren, and who ought to aspire after a proportionable pre-eminence in holiness. Many indeed bear that name, who are far from answering the scriptural character of ministers: and we all may learn, by these instructive emblems, what need we have to be humbled, and ashamed of our inconsistent conduct, and defective services: for though faithful ministers emulate the obedience of angels; yet they are conscious, that they “do not the things which they would.” It behoves us, however, to look into this mirror that we may learn “what manner of persons we ought to be;” and what we are; and may thus know what to pray and strive for; that we may become more bold, laborious, loving, prudent, spiritual, active, vigilant, attentive to our own hearts, and devoted to the work of our gracious Lord. May he bless, uphold, encourage, and prosper all, who in any measure answer to these characters: may he raise up numbers of such ministers, in all the four quarters of the globe: and may he convert many blind guides into faithful pastors: and ‘illuminate all bishops, ‘priests, and deacons, with the true knowledge ‘of his holy word.’ Thus the worship of the church on earth, under the guidance and instruction of able and spiritual ministers, will become more like that of adoring seraphim: whilst the multitude of his people, in every place, as with one heart and voice, ascribe the whole honor of their redemption and conversion, their present privileges and future hopes, to the eternal and most holy God, who is “worthy to receive glory and dominion,” as the Omnipotent Creator and Sustainer, and the Sovereign Lord of the whole universe. May the name of our “heavenly Father be” thus “hal- lowed, his kingdom come, his will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.” Amen. (Notes, Matt. 6:9, 10, 13.)

4 And I wept much, ‡because no man was found worthy to open and to read the book, neither to look thereon.

Note.—The vision still continuing, the apostle next “saw a book in the right hand of him who sat upon the throne,” (Note, 4:1—3.) which was “written within, and on the outside, and sealed with seven seals.” (Note, Ex. 2:9, 10.) It appeared as a roll, consisting of several parchments, according to the custom of those times: and though it was supposed to be written within, yet nothing could be read till the seals were loosed. It was afterwards found to contain seven parchments, or small volumes, each of which was separately sealed: but if all the seals had been on the outside, nothing could have been read till they had all been loosed; whereas the loosing of each seal was followed by some discovery of the contents of the roll: yet the appearance on the outside seems to have indicated, that it consisted of seven, or at least of several parts. This roll, however, was an emblem of the secret decrees and purposes of God, relative to future events, from which all prophecies are, as it were, extracts; but it represented especially those secret purposes of God which were about to be revealed; and it may therefore be considered as the same, for substance, with that part of this book of the Revelation, which follows.—A mighty angel, as the Lord’s herald to all creatures, by proclamation, inquired who was “worthy,” by his personal dignity or excellency, or the extraordinary services performed by him, to have the honor of opening this book. But there was no one, either angel in heaven, or man on earth, or spirit of man in the separate state, whose body lay under the earth, who could claim so high an honor; or so much as behold, and obtain the least insight into “the deep things of God” which it contained. (Notes, 11—14. Phil. 2:9—11.) When this was made known, the apostle, who had gone up thither, with earnest desires and expectations of hearing things, which should come to pass in after times, wept much at his supposed disappointment.

Note.—One of the Elders, the emblematical representatives of the church, seemed to the apostle, in his vision, to notice his grief, and to encourage him with the assurance, that “the Lion of the tribe of Judah” had prevailed to open the book; being distinguished from all creatures, and honored far above them all. A tradition has generally prevailed, that a lion was painted on the standard of Judah, when the nation of Israel encamped in the wilderness; but this is not at all probable. (Note, Num. 2: 2.) Christ, however, was descended from Judah, and had been predicted under this emblem of a lion, in Jacob’s blessing. (Notes, Gen. 49: 8—10.) He was infinitely superior in dignity and power to all others of the tribe; and he is most terrible to his obstinate enemies, merciful to those who submit to him, and the guardian of his people: so that this title was peculiarly suited to him. He was described as “the Root of David:” in his human nature he was “a Branch of renown,” sprung up from the decaying root of David’s royal family; in respect of his Deity, he was the Root whence David himself sprang; and, as the promised Messiah, he was the great Honor, and the Source of all the dignity and authority of that distinguished race. (Notes, 22:16, 17. Is. 11: 1. Jer. 23:5, 6. Matt. 22:41—46.) While the Elder was informing John, that Christ had prevailed to open the book; he looked, and saw with astonishment, that near to the throne, and within the circle formed by the living creatures and the elders; (Note, 4:4, 5.) there stood “a Lamb, even as it had been slain,” with the marks of the mortal wounds upon it, though it had been marvellously restored to life. (Notes, 8—14. 6:15—17. 7:9—17. John 1:29.) This was an emblematical representation of the Saviour’s High Priesthood, before God, in our nature, as risen from the dead, through the merit of his Sacrifice, in behalf of “all who come to the Father through him:” so that it was in consequence of that atonement, which the sacrificing of spotless lambs had prefigured from the beginning, that he prevailed to open the book. “The seven horns” of this emblematical Lamb, represented the power of his providential kingdom, to protect his subjects, and annoy his enemies; and his “seven eyes” may denote his prophetic office, and his personal knowledge of all hearts and of all events; but especially, the “treasures of wisdom,” laid up in him to be communicated to his church by “the seven Spirits of God sent forth into all the earth;” that is, the Holy Spirit, as given by him to reveal the truth and will of God to apostles and prophets, that they might be written for the instruction of mankind; and as illuminating the understanding and preparing the hearts of his people to receive that instruction. positors suppose, that seven superior angels, or archangels, are meant; but the texts referred to, and the emblematical style of the book, are inconsistent with that interpretation. (Notes, 2 Chr. 16:7—10. Zech. 3:9, 10. 4:8—10. 6:1—8.)—This divine Saviour, however, approached to receive the book from “the hand of him that sat upon the throne.”

8 And when he had taken the book, ‘the four beasts and four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, ‘having every one of them harps, *and golden vials full of * odors, which are † the prayers of saints.

9 And they † sung a new song, saying, † Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: † for thou wast slain, † and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, † out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation;

10 And hast made us unto our God † kings and priests: † and we shall reign on the earth.

Note.—When Christ, as “the Lamb which had been slain,” had received the book, and was preparing to loose “the seals,” the “four living creatures, and the elders,” who had before prostrated themselves in adoration of the great Creator, (Note, 4:9—11.) now fell down in like manner to worship the Lamb, or the incarnate Son, as the Saviour of sinners; thus rendering him divine honor, even in the presence of the Father’s manifested glory. Their “harps” (with reference to the music and psalmody of the temple,) were emblems of their melodious praises and thanksgivings: “the golden vials,” or small censers or cups, full of odors, like the burning of incense at the tabernacle and temple, represented the acceptableness of the prayers of the saints, through the intercession of Christ, and by the influences of his sanctifying Spirit. (Note, Ps. 141:2.) These were presented by the living creatures and elders, as the prayers of Israel were offered, while the priests were burning incense in the sanctuary. (Note, Luke 1:8—10.) For though heaven is the scene of these visions: yet they had continual reference to the temple and its worship; and the state of the church on earth is throughout particularly adverted to. Moreover, they all joined in a song of praise, which was not only most excellent; but it was also new, in respect of the occasion and composition: for the Old Testament church celebrated the praises of JEHOVAH, their Redeemer from Egypt, and anticipated the coming of the expected Messiah; but the New Testament church adored Christ, as actually come, as having finished his work on earth by his sacrifice on the cross, and as entered into his mediatorial glory. (Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, 7:9—12. 14:1—5. 15:

1—4.) He, therefore, and he alone was worthy to take the book, and disclose the purposes of God to mankind; for he had become incarnate, and, for the glory of God, and the salvation of men, had willingly given himself to be slain as a Sacrifice. Thus “he had redeemed them to God,” by the shedding of his all-atoning blood; that he might bring them, as reconciled and accepted worshippers, into his presence; and he had collected them, by the preaching of the gospel and the power of his grace, out of the various families, languages, and nations of the world, to be exalted and consecrated, “as kings and priests,” through their union with him and conformity to him: they were therefore assured, that even on earth they should acquire the ascendancy both over their personal enemies, and those of his church, as well as “reign with him for ever in heaven:” (Note, 1:4—6.) and that their cause also would finally triumph on earth. (Notes, 18:—20:1—6.)—It is indubitably manifest, that the “four living creatures,” join in, or rather lead, the worship of the Lamb, as “having redeemed them to God:” and this proves beyond controversy, that part of the redeemed church is meant by this emblem; and not angels, whose worship is next described, but in language evidently different. number amounted to many millions, and could not be ascertained. Yet they all, in perfect harmony, with a loud voice of adoration confessed, that "the Lamb, who had been slain," for the redemption of sinful men, was "worthy to receive power," in his mediatorial character, and in human nature, over all creatures in heaven and earth; and "riches," even all the treasures of grace and glory, for the benefit of his people; and that "wisdom, strength, honor, glory, and blessing," should be vested in him and ascribed to him, as the Object of universal adoration, praise, gratitude, and admiring love. Thus "the innumerable company of angels," though they do not stand related to the Saviour as partakers of the same nature, and have no immediate concern in his redemption, are yet represented, as beholding such divine excellency and glory in him, and his mediatorial work, (for "into these things they desire to look,") that they adore and honor him with most rapturous ascriptions of praise; rejoice in his exaltation "far above all principality and power," and his authority in human nature over all of them; and seemed to vie with redeemed sinners in his worship! (Notes, Eph. 3:9—12. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.)—In this they were immediately joined by all the inhabitants of heaven and earth, and the souls of those in the separate state, whose bodies were under the earth, or in the sea; or by all creatures in the universe, according to their several capacities, with the exception of none but the determined enemies of God. (Notes, Ps. 148:) These, indeed the nature of the case, and the whole tenor of scripture, as well as other visions in this book, necessarily exclude; yet they too, though reluctantly, shall bow to Christ, and be put under his feet. (Notes, Is. 45:20—25. Rom. 14:10—12. 1 Cor. 15:20—28. Phil. 2:9—11.) All the rest, however, rendered and ascribed "blessing and honor and glory to him that sat on the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever;" to which "the four living creatures" joined a cordial "Amen." Thus the whole church, by its representatives, fell down and worshipped the eternal God. (Notes, 1:8—11. 4:9—11. John 5:20—23. 1 John 5:20, 21.)—What words could more fully and emphatically declare, that Christ is and ought to be worshipped, equally with the Father, by all creatures, to all eternity? Will any one, after reading this, assert that he is a mere Man, or a created Being? or that it is idolatry to worship him? Or will such persons profess to believe, that this book is the unerring word of God? If they waver as to this point, can they disprove the divinity of a book, the prophecies of which have already been so remarkably accomplished? Or can any man, who opposes the worship of Christ, or the doctrines of his Deity and atonement, and of salvation through faith in his blood, suppose that he can ever enter heaven? or, if this might be, that he could join in the work and worship of that blessed world, or even so much as endure it?—But there can be no dissentients, no discordant voices, in that world of light and love! (Note, Col. 1:9—14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

How vain and presumptuous must all man's endeavors be, to discover future events, beyond the discernment of a sagacious probable conjecture, or as instructed by "the sure word of prophecy:" seeing that all things respecting the future are sealed up in impenetrable secrecy; and no creature in heaven, earth, or hell, is able or worthy to disclose the least tittle of them, except the incarnate Son of God alone! We need not indeed weep, that we cannot foresee the future events respecting ourselves in this world: as the eager expectation and prospect of distant prosperity would unfit us for present duties and conflicts; and the foresight of future calamities would render our most prosperous days distressing. Yet in this distracted evil world, we may properly desire to learn, from the promises and prophecies of scripture, what will be the final event to believers, and to the church; and, in both respects, the Incarnate Son has prevailed to procure us all the information which our circumstances need. May we then value, and study to become acquainted with, every part of that revelation, which he has given us.—What apparently contrary excellencies centre in our Redeemer's character! "The Lion of the tribe of Judah," is also a meek and spotless Lamb, and a bleeding Sacrifice for sin: and while as a Lion he protects his people, even as a Lamb he is most formidable to his obstinate enemies. (Note, 6:15—17.) The whole universe could never, in any other instance, show such a union of unsearchable riches and deep poverty, of sovereign authority and willing entire subjection, of divine dignity and immense humiliation and condescension, of majesty and meekness, of holiness and love of sinners, of justice and mercy, of desert of honor and happiness, with patient endurance of most complicated sufferings. In these, and various other respects, he is altogether worthy of our admiration, confidence, and imitation, as far as it is possible for us to be placed in similar circumstances.

V. 8—14.

As the omnipotent and omniscient Lord of all, our gracious Saviour rules all things by his universal providence, and the energy of his omnipresent Spirit, in subserviency to his great concern of "redeeming us to God with his blood." His faithful ministers, therefore, through all the earth, while they instruct men to worship the Creator and Governor of the world; will also excite them, by their doctrine and example, most humbly to adore "the Lamb that was slain;" and to present their loudest, sweetest songs of praise to him, in and through whom "the prayers of the saints" ascend as incense before the throne of God. He is worthy to reveal and to direct the dispensations of Providence; yea, he is entitled to universal adoration: and if all the angels of God with one voice proclaim, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive authority, riches, wisdom, honor, glory, and blessing!" and if all holy and accepted creatures, in the whole universe, give the same "blessing, and honor, and glory, to him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever" surely they, "whom he hath redeemed to God with his blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation," of the earth, should cordially say Amen to it! Can we allow those persons to be his ministers and disciples, who refuse that honor to him, which all obedient creatures render him without one discordant voice? If it were possible for true Christians to refuse these adorations to the eternal Son of the Father, "even the very stones would cry out" in abhorrence of man's ingratitude to him, who stooped so low for their salvation. We cannot err in adoring him, "whom all the angels of God worship." Thus we shall most acceptably "glorify him, that liveth for ever and ever," and be trained up for the work and joy of heaven; for which no sinner is qualified, who cannot cordially join "the new song" of the redeemed, and ascribe "salvation, and glory, and blessing, to him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb for evermore." Amen.

CHAP. VI.

The opening of six of the seven seals, and the emblematic discovery of future events made after each of them, 1—17.

AND I saw <sup>a</sup> when the Lamb opened one of the seals, and I heard, as it were <sup>b</sup> the noise of thunder, <sup>c</sup> one of the four beasts saying, Come and see.

2 And I saw, and behold, <sup>d</sup> a white horse: <sup>e</sup> and he that sat on him had a bow; <sup>f</sup> and a crown was given unto him: <sup>g</sup> and he went forth conquering, and to conquer.

Note.—It is generally agreed, that this chapter relates to the events, which took place from the time of the vision, to the establishment of Constantine the Great upon the Imperial throne, as the first Christian emperor; by which the persecutions of Pagan Rome ceased, and Christianity became the established and favored religion, throughout the empire.—When the Lord Jesus, as "the Lamb that had been slain," "opened the first seal," the apostle's attention was excited, by a voice like thunder; and one of "the four living creatures," called on him to come and see what passed. This was the voice of him who was "like a lion;" and the same took place, respecting the other living creatures in their order, after the opening of the next three seals; but the meaning of the emblem does not clearly appear. (Note, 4:6—8.)—The apostle then beheld, with astonishment, "a white horse," on which One was mounted, armed with a bow, as for the battle; to him "a crown," denoting royal authority, was given, and he went forth conquering all who opposed him, and still preparing to obtain new victories. (Notes, 19:11—16. Ps. 45:3—5. Zech. 9:13—16.)—Those who suppose the apostle to have had this vision in the reign of Nero, about A. D. 68, explain this emblem of the victories gained by Vespasian and Titus, among which the taking and destruction of Jerusalem was most considerable. But it is almost incredible, that this most important event should be only thus obscurely hinted at; if it had been then in futurity: and it is far more likely, that the apostle wrote this book a considerable time after that event. Others, therefore, explain this discovery of some victories, obtained by the Emperor Trajan, over the surrounding nations: but these events had no immediate connexion with the affairs of the church; and Trajan, who was a persecutor, however celebrated in other respects, was not aptly described by one mounted "on a white horse." (Notes, Zech. 1:7—11. 6:1—8.) This emblem rather denotes righteousness and purity: and the mild beneficent victories of Christ, by his word and Holy Spirit, in the conversion of sinners to "the obedience of faith," seem to have been thus predicted. After his advancement to his mediatorial throne, he had gone forth, as a merciful and beneficent Conqueror, and had obtained many victories: but both Jews and Gentiles opposed the progress of his gospel; yet the opening of this seal, showed that he would still go on with his conquests, and more widely than ever extend his spiritual dominion. Accordingly, accurate historians are of opinion, that Christianity spread more rapidly and extensively among the Gentiles just after this time, than it had before done.—A crown, &c. (2) 14:14. 17:12. Matt. 28:18.

To conquer. (2) ἵνα νικῶσιν. That he might conquer, or add to his conquests. (Notes, Ps. 110:)

3 And <sup>h</sup> when he had opened the second seal, I heard the second beast say, Come and see.

4 And there went out another <sup>i</sup> horse that was red: <sup>k</sup> and power was given to him that sat thereon, to take peace from the earth, and that they should kill one another: <sup>l</sup> and there was given unto him a great sword.

Note.—The "red horse," which appeared at the opening of the second seal, leads our thoughts to wars and conquests of another nature, than those before considered. The Lord Jesus, in his righteous providence, seems to be here represented, as commissioning and employing the executioners of his vengeance on his obstinate enemies. (Marg. Ref. i—l.) Accordingly historians record, that insurrections, bloody battles, massacres, and devastations of a most extraordinary kind, took place, between A. D. 100, and A. D. 138. Five hundred and eighty thousand Jews are computed to have been slaughtered, in different places during that period; and even a larger number of the Romans and Greeks seem to have been butchered by them, in the most barbarous manner imaginable. So that the two parties of the enemies of Christ and the gospel, the Jews and idolaters, seemed to vie with each other, in executing his righteous vengeance on their competitors. Thus the instruments of his indignation were empowered "to take peace from the earth," and to set men on to kill one another; and "a great sword," of war and slaughter, was put into their hand. (Notes, Is. 10:5—15. Jer. 27:4—9. 51:20—24. Ez. 30:20—26.)—Some make this period to have lasted longer, than is above stated; but such difficult questions cannot be particularly discussed, in this compendious view of these comprehensive prophecies.

5 And when <sup>m</sup> he had opened the third seal, I heard the third beast say, Come and see. And I beheld, and lo, <sup>n</sup> a black horse; and he that sat on him <sup>o</sup> had a pair of balances in his hand.

6 And I heard a voice in the midst of the four beasts say, * A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny; <sup>p</sup> and see thou hurt not the oil and the wine.

Note.—“The black horse,” which appeared on the opening of the third seal, was a proper emblem of calamity and mourning; and the balances in the hand of the rider denoted, that in the times referred to there would be a great scarcity of provisions; so that men would have their food weighed out to them, with great exactness, as it is done when any company is reduced to short allowance. (Lev. 26:26. Note, Ez. 4:9—17.) The voice also, which proclaimed the price of corn, has the same meaning; though to an English reader it seems to denote the contrary. For the measure specified, according to the most accurate calculation, held no more than the usual daily allowance for bread to a laboring man, or even to a slave; and the penny, or denarius, (about seven-pence half-penny,) was commonly his day’s wages. (Matt. 20:2.—Table of Money.) If then a poor man could only earn enough to buy a sufficient quantity of bread for himself, without any other necessary of life; to what straits must he be reduced, in endeavoring to sustain a family! The barley indeed was stated to have been much cheaper: but then it is much less serviceable for bread; and the poor could not possibly have obtained more than a bare subsistence, on the meanest food, without reserving any thing for raiment, or other necessaries.—Yet the orders given to the emblematical executioner of this sentence, to “spare the oil and the wine,” may imply, that there should not be a total failure of the fruits of the earth. Perhaps the luxuries were not so much injured as the bread corn. (Note, Gen. 43:11,12.)—This seal is supposed, by some expositors, to have reached from A. D. 138, to A. D. 193; though others state it differently. There is, however, no material disagreement between them; and there are accounts, in the history of those years, of long continued scarcities, through the whole Roman empire; during which, all the care of the emperors and their ministers, could only just prevent the horrors of entire famine.—This was another method, by which Christ fought against the persecutors of his church.

7 And <sup>q</sup> when he had opened the fourth seal, I heard the voice of the fourth beast say, Come and see.

8 And I looked, and behold, a <sup>r</sup> pale horse: and his name that sat on him <sup>s</sup> was Death, and hell followed with him. And power was given <sup>t</sup> unto them <sup>v</sup> over the fourth part of the earth, <sup>u</sup> to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The pale horse, which appeared at the opening of the fourth seal, on which Death rode as a terrific conqueror, followed by hell, (or the grave, and the state of departed souls) to seize on the dead, was an apt emblem of the several divine judgments, which are afterwards enumerated; and through which, it is said, that “power was given to death and hell,” over the fourth part of the earth; or a large proportion of its inhabitants, especially throughout the whole Roman empire. Some expositors make this seal to reach from A. D. 193, to A. D. 270: others include only 50 years of that time under it. However, within the shorter period, there were more than twenty Roman emperors, who for a time ruled with great power, and most of them with great tyranny and cruelty, as long as their dominion continued: there were also above thirty usurpers in different parts of the empire, who supported their claims by war, and perished with multitudes of their adherents. Amidst such intestine convulsions and fierce contests within the several provinces of the empire, “death on his pale horse” must have destroyed immense numbers with the sword. This universal war and confusion, by taking men off from the cultivation of the earth, and destroying the fruits of it when produced, naturally made way for famine; which grievously prevailed in every place. The scanty, low, and unwholesome diet, occasioned by hunger or famine, naturally introduced pestilence, which is often called death by the eastern writers: and the most learned men have declared, that so extensive and destructive a pestilence, as that which during this period wasted the empire for fifteen years together, is not met with in universal history. These desolations must also have given opportunity to wild beasts to increase upon the residue of the inhabitants; and accordingly we read, that they were forced to wage war with wolves, lions, and tigers, and that many were devoured by them. Note.—On the opening of the fifth seal, the apostle observed “under the altar,” (for there is a continual reference to the appearance of the divine glory in the sanctuary, and to the peculiarities of the Jewish worship, (Notes, Is. 6:1—8.) “the souls of those” persons, “who had been slain” for believing and obeying the word of God, and “for the testimony which they” had borne to the truth of the gospel. These appeared as sacrifices, which had newly been offered; to show their fellowship with Christ in his sufferings, (Note, 5:5—7.) and the acceptableness of their faithfulness unto death, through his propitiatory oblation: for it is probable, that the altar of burnt offering is intended; though some understand it of the golden altar for incense, within the sanctuary. These souls appear to have represented, not only such persons as had suffered martyrdom before the apostle had this vision; but the whole multitude, who were slain previous to the prophetic period referred to, beginning about A. D. 270. They however, with one consent and a loud voice, inquired of the Lord, as “holy and faithful,” or “the holy and the true one,” (Note, 3:7.) how long he would endure the provocations of the persecutors, before he proceeded to judge their cause, and avenge their blood on the inhabitants of the earth, by the subversion of the persecuting power of Pagan Rome. This was the language of their zeal for the honor of God, and their desire of the prevalence of the gospel. (Notes, 18:20. Deut. 32:34,35. Ps. 94:1—7. Rom. 12:17—21.) The “white robes given” to each of them denoted, that they were immediately admitted into a state of felicity, as accepted and holy: but they were required to “rest,” and wait a short space for “the avenging of their blood;” as there were many others of their brethren, who would suffer death in the same cause, before the purposes of God respecting the destruction of their persecutors were fulfilled. (Notes, 7:13—17. 12:7—12. 18:20. 19:1—6.)—“Mr. Lowman observes ‘very well, that this representation seems much to favor the immediate happiness of departed ‘saints, and hardly to consist with that uncomfortable opinion, the insensible state of departed souls, till after the resurrection.’ Bp. Newton.—This seal seems to have been a prediction of the terrible persecution of the church, under Dioclesian which reached much further, and was far more bloody, than any of those that had preceded it. The fury of it lasted for ten years, which was called by Christians, ‘The Era of martyrs;’ but this seal is supposed by some expositors to relate to the whole time between A. D. 270, and 304.—Here also there are immaterial differences of opinion among learned men: and as so many interesting events are hinted at in a few verses; it can scarcely be supposed that, after many centuries, we should be able to determine these matters with exactness; especially as the historians of those times were uncommonly inaccurate and confused in their writings.

12 ¶ And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and lo, <sup>a</sup> there was a great earthquake; <sup>b</sup> and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood;

14 And <sup>f</sup> the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; <sup>g</sup> and every mountain and island were moved out of their places.

Note.—The great earthquake, (or violent concussion, whether of the earth or the heavens,) which followed the opening of the sixth seal, was the emblem of extraordinary revolutions, in the civil and religious state of the world, attended with vast commotions of every kind. The extreme “blackness of the sun,” and “the moon becoming blood,” denote the extinction, with horror and bloodshed, of the most exalted and conspicuous persons, such as the emperors and their chief ministers, officers, and nobles: the “falling of the stars,” was emblematical of the degradation, or death, of illustrious persons in great numbers, such as magistrates and senators. The departure of the heaven, like the “rolling up of a parchment” to be laid aside; and the removal of the mountains and islands, seem to have represented the total subversion of the Pagan persecuting dominion, by the victories of Constantine, and by his accession to the imperial throne; and the entire and universal change, which took place at that time. ‘The great lights of ‘the natural world, the powers civil and ecclesiastical, were all eclipsed and obscured, the ‘heathen emperors and Cæsars were slain, the ‘heathen priests and augurs were extirpated, ‘the heathen officers and magistrates were removed; the heathen temples were demolished, ‘and their revenues were appropriated to better ‘uses.’ *Bp. 17 For <sup>t</sup> the great day of his wrath is come; and <sup>u</sup> who shall be able to stand?

Note.—This unexpected change would throw all the persecuting and opposing party into the utmost consternation and despair: and the apostle, in his vision, saw them all, even the slaves and freed-men, as well as the kings, captains, and great or rich men, endeavoring to shelter themselves in dens and caverns, and vehemently wishing to be crushed by rocks and mountains; if that might but cover them from the power and manifested presence of God, and from “the wrath of the Lamb,” whose gospel they had opposed, and whose servants they had persecuted. For the prevalence of Christianity, and the accession of a Christian emperor, would lead them to conclude with desperation, that Jesus was indeed the Lord; that the time was come when he would take full vengeance on his enemies; and that none could resist him, escape from him, or pacify him. (Notes, 9:6. Josh. 10:16—18. Is. 2:19—22. Hos. 10:7,8. Luke 23:26—31.)—The series of prophetic events requires us to interpret this seal, of the victories and accession of Constantine; when the Christian church gained a complete triumph over the persecuting power of Rome Pagan: but the passage may profitably be accommodated to the day of judgment. (Notes, Ps. 2:7—12. 21:8—12.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The ministers of the gospel ought to call men’s attention to the prophecies of scripture, and to the events in Providence, which accomplish them.—The victories of our exalted Redeemer, by the preaching of the gospel, in bringing “the nations to the obedience of faith,” have been and will be progressive, till his cause be universally triumphant, we should therefore rejoice to be in any way instrumental in promoting these beneficent conquests; and our prayers, that “he may still go forth, conquering and to conquer,” should continually be presented before “the throne of grace.”—But he fights in another manner against the despisers of his salvation, and the opposers of his glory: he can raise up and employ sanguinary potentates, or insurgents, to execute his vengeance on his enemies; (Note, Matt. 22:1—10.) and when he gives them power, and leaves them to their “own hearts’ lusts,” they soon excite multitudes to kill one another by “the force of the sword.” He can also withhold the influences of the heavens, and restrain the earth from yielding its increase; and so visit the nations with distressing scarcity, or destructive famine: and death, when commissioned by him, marches forth on “his pale horse,” and pestilences sweep away millions into the grave, and their eternal state; till at length the beasts of the earth seem to acquire the dominion of the desolated lands, and add to the miseries of the few remaining inhabitants. How mad must it then be for the potsherd of the earth to contend against his iron rod!—But let us be thankful for our exemption, in this highly favored land, from these dire calamities, and for our peace, liberty, plenty, and manifold advantages; and let the rich be reminded, even in times of comparative scarcity, to give more liberally to the relief of their poor neighbors, and needlessly spend much less on themselves. In these temporal judgments, the Lord in wrath remembers mercy; and even his own people also partake of many of the calamities, in addition to the persecutions which they often endure; but he will be with them, and cause all to “work together for their good;” and bring them forth out of them, as gold purified in the furnace.

V. 9—17.

Multitudes have already been “slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held constantly” to the truth; and many more will, probably, be thus killed, before his purposes shall be accomplished. But the Lord himself is the Comforter of his afflicted servants: “precious is their blood in his sight;” and their patience unto death in his cause, is a sacrifice most honorable, and therefore most “acceptable, to him through Jesus Christ.”—Their enemies can “only kill the body;” then “the Lord delivereth them out of all their troubles;” “white robes” of joy and triumph “are given to every one of them;” they enter into immediate rest; and, after a short season, “the earth shall disclose their blood,” and the vengeance which is written will be executed on all their impenitent persecutors, by the holy and faithful Lord of all. (Notes, Ps. 149:7—9. Is. 26:20,21.) He has gained many signal victories over the most powerful enemies of his church; and vast revolutions, and convulsions in empires, have been effected, in order to the establishment of Christianity, in defiance of opposing princes and nations; yet hitherto the commanders in this contest have rallied their scattered troops, and returned to the desperate charge. But he will shortly gain a more decided, universal, and durable victory, than any which he has yet obtained: and with more terrible destruction to the armies of the aliens. (Notes, 19:11—21.) And if, on such occasions, the most powerful kings, and valiant captains, and all other opposers of his power, are so dismayed, as to hide themselves in dens and caverns; what will the terror of the wicked be at the day of judgment, when the sun and moon shall literally be turned into darkness; when the heavens and earth shall become one common conflagration, till “they pass away, and no place be found for them;” and when the great day of the wrath of the Lamb will indeed be come, and none of his enemies will be able to abide it! In vain will they then “call to the rocks and mountains, to hide them from him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb;” from which none will be preserved, except that despised company, who have here believed, loved, and obeyed him. “Heaven and earth shall pass away, but his words shall not pass away.” Be wise now, therefore, O “ye kings, be instructed, ye judges of the earth; serve the LORD with fear, and rejoice with trembling. Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish.” (Notes, Ps. 2:7—12.) And may all those who “look for such things be diligent, that they may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless.” (Note, 2 Pet. 3:10—13.)

CHAP. VII.

The four winds are restrained, by four angels, from hurling the earth fill “another Angel” seals the servants of God in the forehead, 1—3. The number of the sealed from the several tribes of Israel, 4—8. An innumerable multitude of all nations are seen before the throne, 9—12; with an account of the way in which they came thither, and the blessedness which they enjoy, 13—17.

AND <sup>a</sup> after these things, I saw <sup>b</sup> four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, <sup>c</sup> holding the four winds of the earth, that <sup>d</sup> the wind should not blow on the earth, nor on the sea, nor on any tree.

2 <sup>e</sup> And I saw another Angel ascending from the east, <sup>f</sup> having the seal of <sup>g</sup> the living God: and he cried with a loud voice to the four angels, <sup>h</sup> to whom it was given to hurt the earth and the sea,

Note.—This chapter is a continuation of the sixth seal. (Notes, 6:12—17, 8:1—6.)—The “four angels, standing on the four corners of the earth,” represent the instruments of Providence throughout the nations, in all parts of the earth: and their “restraining the winds,” that no destructive tempests might be excited by land or sea, is supposed to be an emblem of the tranquillity of the Roman empire, and of all nations, subsequent to Constantine’s accession to the imperial throne; which was the more delightful, as it succeeded such long continued and terrible convulsions and desolations.—At the same time, “another angel came up from the east.” This angel seems to have been an emblem of Christ himself; for who else could have “the seal of the living God,” even the Holy Spirit, by which his people are “sealed unto the day of redemption?” (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:21,22. Eph. 1:13,14. 4:30—32.)—By his gospel, he came from the eastern nations, where his religion was first published; as the rising sun proceeds from east to west: and he diffused that heavenly light to the western, or European, provinces of the empire, and accompanied it by his new creating Spirit; and thus “sealed” great numbers as “the servants of God.” This great “Angel of the covenant” as one having sovereign authority, called to the other angels, to whom a commission had been given, to bring calamities on mankind by land and sea; ordering them not to execute it, till he and his ministers, as the instruments of his grace, had sealed the “servants of God in the forehead;” that they might be evidently distinguished from others, and so be preserved during the approaching calamities. This signified, that great numbers would be baptized, and profess themselves disciples of Christ, during the happy tranquillity which followed Constantine’s accession; and that very many would be really converted, and renewed to the image of God, by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit.—The gospel was very extensively preached during this period, and immense multitudes embraced Christianity. The favor, indeed, shown to the converts to Christianity, in an indiscriminate and injudicious manner, induced numbers from secular motives to profess themselves Christians; and thus tended greatly to fill the church with hypocrites, which introduced a worldly spirit, and at length caused manifold evils; yet this prophecy fully proves, that real religion was at first greatly promoted by the advancement of a Christian emperor; and that it obtained an establishment in many places, which before had little regarded it.—“I saw another Angel, even ‘the great Angel of the covenant, Christ Jesus, ‘ascending up from the eastern coast, where ‘Jerusalem stood; who, by virtue of his Mediatorship, had in his hand that Seal, or mark ‘of the living God, which in his eternal decree ‘is set upon his elect, whereby they are sealed ‘both to salvation in the end, and to a gracious ‘protection till then: who did, by the mighty ‘voice of his word, command these four angels, ‘... saying, Hold your hands, &c.’ *Bp. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—This account of the numbers sealed from the twelve tribes, cannot be understood in a literal sense; for if we explain it exclusively of converts from the nation of Israel, it can hardly be supposed, that exactly the same number of each tribe was sealed. But Israel was the ancient people of God, which after some generations was incorporated as a church and a nation: and the Christian church, which succeeded to it, had, after a long time, supplanted both the Mosaic dispensation, and the idolatry of Pagan Rome, and acquired an establishment upon the ruins of them. For the times of Constantine seem intended. (Note, 6:12—14.) As therefore the tribes of Israel were numbered, after they were formed into a nation; so the numbers added to the church, in consequence of this establishment, were figuratively declared to be one hundred and forty-four thousand, or twelve times twelve thousand; a large definite number, probably, being put for an indefinite: and this being divided into twelve parts, one of them was assigned to each of the tribes of Israel; intimating that these persons succeeded to their privileges and occupied their place: for, I apprehend, the Gentile converts, as well as those of Israel, were intended, (Note, 9—12.) since none else are mentioned as having been sealed.—The tribes are here arranged differently than in any other place. Judah is placed first, in honor of Christ who sprang from him: Dan is wholly omitted, perhaps because idolatry was first publicly established by that tribe. (Notes, Judg. 18:.) Others, however, think that the tribe of Dan had long before become nearly extinct: and, indeed, the tribe is not expressly mentioned in the genealogies contained in the first of Chronicles. Levi is numbered with the rest; and Joseph is placed instead of Ephraim, while Manasseh is likewise continued. The order of primogeniture is neglected; nor is any regard shown to the children of the free-women, above those of the bond-women, as both are alike in Christ.—No satisfactory reason for these variations can be assigned. (Gen. 29:32—35. 30:1—22. 49: Num. 1: 26: Deut. 33:)

11 And <sup>d</sup> all the angels stood round about the throne, and about the elders and the four beasts, <sup>e</sup> and fell before the throne on their faces, <sup>f</sup> and worshipped God, 12 Saying, <sup>g</sup> Amen: <sup>h</sup> Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and <sup>i</sup> thanksgiving, and honor, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen.

Note.—Many expositors suppose, that the preceding verses relate exclusively to the Jewish converts, who were at this time added to the church; and that these refer to the Gentiles who embraced the gospel during the same period; and others explain them of the peace and prosperity of the church during those days. But it appears to me evident, that the happy estate of those, who had adhered to Christ during the preceding calamities, and had been “faithful unto death,” was intended: for though they had been slain, or had otherwise been removed, before the favorable change took place: they were by this no losers, nay, exceedingly benefited: and the language of the subsequent verses is so energetic, that nothing short of heavenly felicity can answer to it. (Note, 13—17.)—A multitude so large, that no man could number it, collected from the several nations of the earth known in those days, appeared to “stand before the throne,” as accepted worshippers of God; and “before the Lamb,” as his redeemed people. (Notes, 5:8—10. 19:1—6.) This view and interpretation give us enlarged conceptions of the success of the gospel, during the first three centuries; and may encourage the hope, that vast numbers lived by obedient faith, and died in Christ, unknown to history; notwithstanding the lamentable account transmitted to us, of the heresies, contentions, and corruptions, which prevailed at that early period. For these form by far the most prominent subjects, in the ecclesiastical records of those times.—Every one of this company was “clothed in white robes,” as perfectly justified, sanctified, and made happy in heaven. (Notes, 3:4—6. 6:9—11. 19:7,8. Ps. 51:7. Is. 1:16—20. 1 Cor. 6:9—11.) They had also been engaged in war: as victors, they carried the well known emblem of palm branches: and having obtained complete salvation, in respect of their souls, they ascribed it in no degree to themselves, or to their own wisdom, strength, labors, services, sufferings, or martyrdom; but gave the whole glory of it to their God and Father, who was seated "on the throne," as being the effect of his unmerited love and grace; "and unto the Lamb," as it was entirely bestowed on them through his atonement and mediation. While these redeemed sinners stood next to the throne, and led the worship of heaven, in virtue of their union with the incarnate Son of God; the angels, free from the least emotion of envy, and rejoicing in their exaltation, and the glory of God in it, stood without the circle, made by the emblematical representatives of the church and its ministers, and in prostrate adoration added their cordial Amen, to the praises rendered to God and the Lamb. They then showed their delight in that solemn and rapturous worship, by ascribing "blessing and glory to" their God and Portion, as the Fountain of all excellency and felicity; celebrating his manifold wisdom in these surprising events; joining their thanksgivings to those of redeemed sinners; rendering him the honor of all his wonderful works; and rejoicing that power and might belonged to him for ever and ever. This, being connected with their consent to the praises rendered to God and the Lamb, clearly intimated that "they honored the Son, even as they honored the eternal Father." (Note, 5:11-14.)

Note.—The scene, thus presented to the apostle's mind, related to events which did not occur till above two hundred years afterwards, namely, in the time of Constantine: as he was, therefore, receiving prophetic information, one of the representatives of the universal church inquired of him, whether he knew who they were, thus "arrayed in white robes," or whence they came. And the apostle having respectfully replied, that he was persuaded the elder well knew, thus intimating his desire of instruction; he was shown, that "these were persons who had come out of great tribulation."—This could not be meant of the Gentiles, converted to Christianity after the accession of Constantine: for they had come out of no great tribulation peculiar to them rather than others: and though it might be accommodated to the state of the church at large in those peaceful days, which had succeeded to a season of extreme tribulation; yet it far more aptly and emphatically represented the case of those multitudes, who had been "faithful unto death," amidst the harassing persecutions of the foregoing ages. (Notes, 6:9-11. Acts 14:19-23. 1 Thes. 3:1-5. 2 Thes. 1:5-10. 2 Tim. 3:10-12.)—They had, indeed, been "in great tribulation," from many causes, but they were now come forth out of it; and their sorrows and sufferings were finished and terminated for ever.—They were attired "in white robes:" but their robes had not always been white; for they had "washed them and made them white." This they had effected, not by their repentance, or forms, or services, or acts of charity; no, not by their labors and sufferings for the gospel, or their blood shed in martyrdom; but they had washed their robes from the guilt and pollution which had contaminated them, "in the blood of the Lamb;" by faith in his atoning Sacrifice and prevailing intercession, and by trusting in his name for the mercy and grace, which he died to procure for sinners; and by living by the sanctification of his Spirit unto obedience. "Therefore" they had found acceptance with God, and admission into heaven, and "stood before the throne;" where with unceasing, yea, continually augmented pleasure, they served and worshipped God "day and night;" (Notes, Ps. 134: Heb. 4:3-11, v. 9.) whilst he graciously dwelt among them as their Father and Friend, overshadowing them with his presence, and filling them with ineffable and rapturous joy. Thus, by his love, and the displays of his glory, all their thirstings after him and holiness were fully satisfied; nor were they troubled with one desire of any other or greater happiness, than they securely enjoyed. (Notes, Matt. 5:6. Luke 16:24-26. John 4:10-15. 6:30-35.) Neither were they exposed to any affliction, temptation, fear, or persecution; (like the heat of the noon-day sun;) as all these were finally passed away. (Notes, Ps. 121:5-8. Is. 26:3-6. 32:1,2. Matt. 13:3-8, 20, 21.) For "the Lamb who redeemed them to God with his blood;" and who, in consequence of his victory, was seated with his Father upon his throne, employed his power and authority in satisfying and anticipating all their wants, and conducting them to the inexhaustible Fountain-head of unalloyed felicity; whilst the eternal Father, as "delighting over them to do them good," "wiped away all tears from their eyes," and turned their former sorrows into the fulness of eternal joy. (Notes, 21:1—4, 22—27. 22:1—5. Is. 25:6—9. 60:15—22.)—Nothing on earth can fully answer to such language as this: and indeed the prosperity of the church at the time predicted very soon terminated as a dream; (Notes, 12.) and cannot be reasonably considered, as exclusively, or primarily, nor indeed at all intended, by this most energetic and rapturous language. But such a view of the immediate felicity of those, who followed Christ faithfully in the predicted season of persecution, was very proper to reconcile the minds of Christians to their trials, and to animate them to face death in its most terrifying forms. Accordingly, the church, during these times, seems to have studied this book more, and even to have understood this first part of it far better, than Christians in succeeding generations have generally done.—"With God is the Fountain of life;" but it is "the Lamb that was slain," who "leads sinners unto that Fountain of living waters." #### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The intervals of peace on earth are caused by a positive divine interposition, to restrain the furious passions of men, and the agency of Satan; which at all times naturally tend to confusion, discord, mischief, and misery.—When the Lord Jesus sees good to grant his church seasons of rest, and to raise up men endued with authority, to countenance and concur in promoting the gospel; he commonly "seals" many by his converting grace, "unto the day of redemption;" (Note, Acts 9:31.) But human depravity, and the artifices of Satan, often pervert peaceful and prosperous days into an occasion of negligence and hypocritical profession; and this makes way for the ministering angels being again commissioned to bring calamities upon the earth. Nothing, however, can finally hurt those, who are "sealed by the Spirit;" nor let it be deemed futile to observe, that this seal must be "on the forehead," visible both to friends and foes, but not to the believer himself, except as he looks steadfastly in the glass of God's word. (Notes, Ez. 9:1—7. P. O.)—It is encouraging to those, who are decidedly on the Lord's part in this evil world, to hear of the increase of "the true Israel of God;" and they will pray him to add to their numbers "a hundred fold more, how many soever they be;" and, though they, who offer these fervent prayers, may not live to witness this blessed change, they must exult to recollect what multitudes are gone before them to heaven; and what accessions are daily making to the number from all the nations of the earth; and what glorious times are coming, according to the sure word of prophecy.

V. 9—17.

The few believers, who are scattered abroad in this world, seem a solitary and singular remnant, and as such are generally despised: yet they have innumerable friends and coadjutors, with whom they will shortly and for ever be united. The whole multitude, who now stand before the throne of God, with all that ever shall be saved, were once "dead in sin" and exposed to wrath; but they were taught their guilt and danger, and led to trust in the Lamb of God. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—15. Eph. 2:1—10.) Thus they began to fight the good fight of faith, against Satan, the world, and sin; amidst many fears, sorrows, and temptations: at length they obtained "the garments of joy," and the palm of victory; and now they ascribe all their "salvation to God, and to the Lamb;" while adoring angels delight to swell the chorus of their joyful thanksgivings. Could we ascend into heaven, and inquire, "who they are that are arrayed in white robes, and whence they came;" amidst ten thousand differences in other matters, we should learn that every one of them had come out of sorrow, and out of sin; that they had all been in conflict and tribulation; and that they had all "washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."—Not one discordant voice will be heard in heaven for ever; nor could those who expect salvation, in any other way, join the praises of that blessed world, or even say, Amen, to them. As all the redeemed owe their felicity wholly to the sovereign mercy of the Father, through the atonement of the Son, and by the sealing and new creation of the Holy Spirit; so the work and worship of God their Saviour is their element, and his presence and favor complete their felicity; nor can they conceive of any other joy. Let us then inquire whether we have, in our judgment, experience, and affections, "the meetness for this inheritance of the saints in light." (Note, Col. 1:9—14.) All who are admitted to the marriage supper of the Lamb, previously seek and obtain "the wedding garment:" none will ever join this company before the throne, who have not on earth learned to lisp their song, and to anticipate their felicity. If this be our privilege, let us bless God for his mercy, and patiently endure our season and measure of tribulation; expecting shortly "to hunger no more, and thirst no more;" to have no more sin, temptation, or sorrow; to be with our beloved Saviour, enjoying the fulness of his love, drinking ineffable delights from "the living fountains of waters," to which he will lead us, and to have all tears for ever wiped from our eyes.—"I have waited for thy salvation, O LORD." (Notes, Gen. 49:18. Is. 12:1—3. Luke 2:25—32.)

CHAP. VIII.

The seventh seal is opened; and, after a short silence, seven angels appear with seven trumpets prepared to announce approaching judgments; with reference to Christ's intercession, and the prayers of his saints, 1—6. The sounding of four of the trumpets, with the emblematical predictions following each of them; and an intimation of more awful calamities, under the other three, 7—12.

AND when he had opened the seventh seal, there was <sup>b</sup>silence in heaven about the space of half an hour.

4 And <sup>l</sup>the smoke of the incense, which came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God out of the Angel's hand.

5 And the Angel took the censer, <sup>m</sup>and filled it with fire of the altar, and cast it <sup>n</sup>into the earth: <sup>o</sup>and there were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and <sup>o</sup>an earthquake.

6 And the <sup>p</sup>seven angels, which had the seven trumpets, prepared themselves to sound.

Note.—The last of the seven seals contains under it far more than all the others; as it introduces, and indeed included that period which fell under the seven trumpets. When this seal was opened, "there was silence in heaven for about half an hour;" which either intimated, that the peace of the church and of the empire, would be of a very short continuance, or it was expressive of the solemn expectation excited on the occasion. During this interval, the apostle saw "the seven angels who stood before God," having been appointed to this service, of whom we shall read more afterwards: and "to each of them was given a trumpet" that they might in succession sound an alarm to the nations. (Marg. Ref. d.)—At the same time "Another Angel" appeared as a Priest, standing before the altar of incense. The appearance of a Lamb was emblematical of "Christ our Passover, sacrificed for us;" and this Angel no doubt represented him in his priestly character, offering up the prayers of all his saints before God, accompanied by his all prevailing intercession. (Note, Luke 1:8—10.) This being done, "the Angel filled the censer with fire from the altar." As there was no fire on the golden altar, except that in the censer, which was taken from the altar of burnt-offering; the fire, here spoken of, must have at first come from the altar of burnt-offering. This the Angel cast on the earth; "and there were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake." This denoted, that the approaching calamities would be the effect of the displeasure of God with men, for their opposition to the gospel of his Son, and their injurious and cruel treatment of his people; and so in fact be inflicted, as an answer to their prayers for deliverance, through the intercession of Christ. (Notes, 6:9—11. 11:15—18.) After this, the seven angels prepared to sound the trumpets.—'The great Angel of the covenant ... came and stood, as the High Priest of his church, before the altar of heaven; ... and many holy and effectual prayers were offered unto him, that he might, by his merciful mediation present them to God the Father.' Bp. Hall.—'The placing of this circumstance immediately before the sounding of the trumpets, suggests, that the subject of these prayers was the occasion of something to be called for by these trumpets; and what could this be, but that of the destruction of the Roman empire? It is plainly suggested, that the petition for some delay would be accepted; yet all further applications on that head, are discouraged by a most significant emblem, the censer being cast away.' Whitaker. (Notes, Ec. 27:1—8. 30:1—8. Lev. 10:1,2. 16:11—14.)

7 The first angel sounded, and there followed <sup>a</sup>hail and fire mingled with blood, and they were <sup>r</sup>cast upon the earth: and <sup>s</sup>the third part of trees was burnt up, and all green grass was burnt up.

Note.—The emblematical predictions following the four first trumpets, principally related to the gradual, but complete subversion of the Roman empire, in the western part of the world; though this was connected with multiplied calamities in the eastern provinces, which are also implied. Constantine the great built Constantinople, and made it his residence, and the metropolis of the empire; and, by a concurrence of circumstances some time after his death, that vast fabric, the Roman empire, was divided into two parts, governed by two distinct successions of emperors. But the western and eastern empires, when thus separated, were not wholly unconnected: so that the ruin of the western empire was attended by great convulsions in the eastern; and the subsequent subversion of the latter occasioned manifold evils in the countries, which had constituted the former. As therefore the events, which related to the two divisions of the empire, were thus involved with one another, it was proper that the predictions of them should be so likewise: yet the residue of the chapter primarily predicts the subversion of the western, and the next chapter that of the eastern empire. (Notes, 9:)—The calm, which followed Constantine's accession to the throne, did not last long: even the latter part of his life was far from being undisturbed; and after his death many bloody wars were waged within the empire, by his sons with each other, and other competitors, for the imperial authority: whilst the church was disturbed by various descriptions of heretics; and unnatural persecutions were raised, by men who called themselves Christians. These and other evils weakened both the church and the state; and after a time, the Huns and Goths from the northern regions of Europe, broke in upon the distracted empire, and made terrible ravages in many of its provinces. The latter events seem to have been especially intended by the storm of "hail and fire mingled with blood," by which a third part of the productions of the earth were destroyed; that is, multitudes were killed, both high and low, grown persons and infants, through the whole Roman empire, which might be deemed a third part of the earth, as discovered at that time. (Ex. 9:22—25. Marg. Ref.)—This period is supposed by some approved expositors, to reach from A. D. 338, to 412: but others explain it principally of the incursions of the Goths under Alaric, who entered the empire A. D. 395; and after spreading desolation by fire and sword through the provinces, A. D. 410, took and plundered Rome, with circumstances of barbarity very correspondent to these emblems, as contemporary writers have testified: especially in that he slew without distinction, princes, nobles, priests, and people, and showed no mercy even to the tender infants; thus destroying "the trees and the green grass," or smaller vegetable productions, indiscriminately.—"The first four trumpets describe the removal of that power; which in 'the days of Paul, ... prevented the development of "the man of sin:" namely, the western imperial dignity of Rome.' Faber.—"On the 'decease of Theodosius, that great prince, A. D. 395, the northern cloud, which had been 'so long gathering, discharged itself. He died 'in the month of January, and before the end 'of the same year, the Gothic nation was in 'arms.—The barriers of the Danube were 'thrown open; the savage warriors of Scythia 'issued from their forests; and the uncommon 'severity of the winter, (the season in which 'natural hail and snow are generated,) allowed 'the poet to remark, that they rolled their ponderous wagons over the broad and icy back 'of the indignant river. The fertile fields of 'Phocis and Beotia were covered with a deluge 'of barbarians, who massacred the males of an 'age to bear arms, and drove away the beautiful females, with the spoil and cattle of the 'flaming villages.' Gibbon.—"I have adopted the 'language of the historian. Unconscious, that 'he was bearing his testimony to the truth of 'prophecy, he has used the same allegorical 'language, as that employed by St. John. "'The correspondence of nations,' says he, 'was "'in that age so imperfect and precarious, 'that "'the revolutions of the north might escape "'the knowledge of the court of Ravenna; till "'the dark cloud, which was collected along the "'coasts of the Baltic, burst in thunder upon "'the banks of the upper Danube.'" Faber.—The nature of this publication must exclude most of the quotations, which might be made from Gibbon, the elegant and infidel historian of the decline of the Roman empire: but he has certainly, without intending it, shown the exact completion of these prophecies, in many instances.—Different opinions prevail, as to the duration of the events, predicted by the sounding of the first trumpet; but it cannot be expected, that these topics, which after all, very slightly affect the main subject, should be here particularly noticed. Some think, that all the calamities brought on the empire, by the northern invaders, and especially those of Attila, mentioned in the ensuing note, were intended by the general language of this verse; though other eminent expositors place a part of them under the second trumpet.

8 ¶ And the second angel sounded, and as it were a great mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea; and the third part of the sea became blood:

9 And the third part of the creatures which were in the sea, and had life, died; and the third part of the ships were destroyed.

Note.—"A great burning mountain" is an emblem of a mighty destructive warrior, and has been so used by the most celebrated poets. (Note, Jer. 51:25.) The Roman empire, with its vast multitude of people and nations, might be aptly compared to the sea. (17:15.) This "great mountain, burning with fire," therefore, being "cast into the sea," with the effects produced by it, represented most emphatically the irruption of the barbarous nations, under ferocious leaders, into the Roman empire, and their shedding of the blood of immense multitudes, and destroying the cities, or desolating the country with fire and sword. After Alaric, with his Goths, had finished his depredations; Attila, at the head of a vast army of Huns, ravaged the empire during the space of fourteen years, massacring, plundering, and destroying all before him, in the most barbarous manner which can be conceived. He even called himself 'the scourge of God, and the terror of mankind;' and perhaps no man ever better merited that title. He was indeed a "burning mountain cast into the sea, and turning it into blood;" for he drenched the countries with the blood of the inhabitants, and destroyed every thing which came in his way; nor did any part of the empire wholly escape his fury. These events seem to have been principally intended; but we may include under this trumpet the various calamities, which befell the empire from A. D. 412, to 450.—If these devastations under Attila from the north, belong to the first trumpet; those under Genserick, king of the Vandals, from Africa, to the south, must be here intended. (Note, 10, 11).—But, whether Attila or Genserick were meant, it is manifest, that the "third part of the sea turned into blood," is the emblem of the Roman empire, supposed to contain a third part of the world; and the burning mountain must consequently mean the conqueror, who produced these effects, and not the conquered: else in the same verse there are two emblems of the latter, and none of the former. (Notes, 16:3—7. Ex. 7: 15—21.) there fell <sup>a</sup> a great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers, and upon <sup>b</sup> the fountains of waters.

11 And the name of the star is called <sup>c</sup> Wormwood: and the third part of the waters became wormwood: and <sup>d</sup> many men died of the waters, because they were made bitter.

Note.—The “great star falling from heaven,” is explained by some expositors, of the Arian and Pelagian heresies, and the contests and persecutions connected with them. And, no doubt, such events might very aptly be represented by “the falling of a star,” and its imbittering and poisoning the waters, to the destruction of those who drank of them; the church also was miserably corrupted, and deformed by heresy, during that period. (Notes, Ex. 15:22—24. 2 Kings 2:19—22.)—Yet, the series of the prophecy favors the interpretation of those, who explain these verses, to predict the continuation of those calamities, which subverted the empire. An eminent prince, suddenly appearing in the heart of the empire, and conspicuous even in the mischiefs which he occasioned, might be aptly represented by “a great star,” or luminous meteor, shooting “from heaven, and burning as a lamp.” The name “Wormwood,” and the effect of its falling upon the waters, denoted the further desolations of the empire, and the ruin of the remaining comforts, which were left to the relics of the miserable inhabitants; who were so harassed and afflicted, that they could not seek for the necessary support of life, without exposing themselves to the fury of the invaders. (Notes, Judg. 5:11. Lam. 5:8—10.) Thus the imbittering and poisoning of the rivers and fountains, completed the former judgment of turning the sea into blood.—Accordingly, very soon after Attila’s retreat, Genserick unexpectedly invaded the empire with three hundred thousand Vandals and Moors from Africa; besieged and took Rome, and abandoned that city to the cruelty, avarice, and licentiousness of his troops; and by this success he so weakened the empire, that it was soon after subverted. As this assault was made at the very source of the Roman power and prosperity, it might on this account likewise be represented, as poisoning the rivers and fountains of waters.—Genserick was also a bigoted Arian, and a cruel persecutor of the orthodox Christians; and in this sense too he poisoned the fountains. These events occurred between A. D. 450, and 456.

Wormwood. (11) Αγριδος. Here only. (Note, Deut. 29:18.)

12 ¶ And the fourth angel sounded, <sup>e</sup> and the third part of the sun was smitten, and the third part of the moon, and the third part of the stars; so as the third part of them was darkened, <sup>f</sup> and the day shone not for a third part of it, and the night likewise.

Note.—Under the fourth trumpet the sun, moon, and stars, or the great luminaries of the Roman empire were eclipsed and darkened: (Notes, 6:12—14. Matt. 24:29—31.) for the third part, though spoken of the luminaries, or the time of their shining, seems still to refer to the extent of the empire, as containing one third of the then known world. While the splendor of the eastern empire was greatly tarnished, and it shone but with a feeble and almost expiring light; that of the western was gradually extinguished. ‘Genserick left it in a ‘weak and desperate condition: it struggled ‘hard, and as it were gasped for breath, during ‘eight short and turbulent reigns, for the space ‘of twenty years, till at length it expired, A. D. ‘476, under Momyllus, who was in derision called Augustulus, or the diminutive Augustus.’ Bp. Newton. Still, however, though the Roman sun was extinguished, its subordinate luminaries faintly shone, whilst the senate and consuls continued. But, after several other changes, at length, A. D. 566, the whole form of the ancient government was subverted, and Rome itself was reduced, from being the empress of the world, to be a poor dukedom tributary to the Exarch of Ravenna.—The events of above two hundred years are here predicted in six verses; events peculiarly important in themselves, and in their consequences, yet recorded by historians in the most disorderly and intricate manner. However therefore it may suit the design of those, who confine their labor to this one part of scripture, to enter into particulars, or to argue either for or against any interpretation; it cannot fall in with the design of a practical exposition of the whole word of God. The author observes, with satisfaction, that the interpreters agree in the grand outline: and even the testimony of infidels, when writing the history of these times, demonstrates the exact accomplishment of the prophecy.—‘I have ‘now accomplished the laborious narrative of ‘the decline and fall of the Roman empire, from ‘the fortunate age of Trajan and the Antonines, ‘to its utter extinction in the west, about five ‘centuries after the Christian era. At that unhappy period, the Saxons fiercely struggled ‘with the natives for the possession of Britain; ‘Gaul and Spain were divided between the powerful monarchies of the Franks and the Visigoths, and the dependent kingdoms of the ‘Suevi and Burgundians: Africa was exposed ‘to the cruel persecution of the Vandals, and to ‘the savage insults of the Moors: Rome and ‘Italy, as far as the banks of the Danube, were ‘afflicted by an army of barbarian mercenaries, ‘whose lawless tyranny was succeeded by the ‘reign of Theodorick the Ostrogoth. All the ‘subjects of the empire, who, by the use of the ‘Latin language, more particularly deserved ‘the name and privileges of Romans, were oppressed by the disgrace and calamities of foreign conquest; and the victorious nations of ‘Germany established a new system of manners ‘and government, in the western countries of ‘Europe.’ Gibbon.—Can there now be the shadow of a doubt, concerning the exact accomplishment of these compendious prophecies, some hundreds of years after they were written? And who can then hesitate to say, that St. John wrote by the inspiration of that God, who sees the end from the beginning?

13 ¶ And I beheld, and heard an angel <sup>a</sup> flying through the midst of heaven, saying with a loud voice, <sup>b</sup> Woe, woe, woe, to the inhabitants of the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels, which are yet to sound!

Note.—This “angel flying through the midst of heaven,” to denounce a woe thrice repeated, on the inhabitants of the earth, under the three remaining trumpets, was an emblem intended to excite the strictest attention, and most awful expectation; and to intimate that evils still greater, more extensive, and durable, would come on mankind in the subsequent ages; the events of which were about to be predicted. Hence they are generally called ‘the three woe-trumpets;’ and this introduction should be kept in mind.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The intervals of peace, which the church has hitherto enjoyed, have commonly been of short continuance.—Amidst the confusion occasioned by the vices of mankind, we should rejoice that “the Lord reigneth;” and that the prayers of all true believers, being presented through the meritorious intercession of our great High Priest, will surely be accepted and answered.—All created angels are “ministering spirits,” for the benefit of “the heirs of salvation;” even when they are employed to visit nations with terrible calamities: nay, “the fire from the altar,” being cast on the earth, (the vengeance inflicted for men’s contempt of the sacrifice and salvation of Christ, and the injuries done to his people,) causes the most terrible desolations which occur in human affairs.—While the present wrath of God and of the Lamb, through those executioners of vengeance who mean not so, fills countries with misery, destroys the wretched inhabitants, and embitters and poisons all the comforts of life, till the greatest prosperity is totally darkened and extinguished, and all ranks and orders of men involved in one common and dire calamity; the messengers of the Lord are ordered to proclaim aloud in all the world, that still more dreadful woes are in reserve for all the impenitent “workers of iniquity:” for what are all temporal evils, compared with “the destruction of body and soul in hell?” Let sinners then take warning to “flee from the wrath to come:” let believers learn to value and to be thankful for their privileges; and let them “patiently continue in well-doing;” and so “look for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.”

CHAP. IX.

The fifth trumpet sounds, and the bottomless pit is opened, 1, 2. The success of the Saracens, and the propagation of the imposture of Mohammed, are emblematically predicted, 3—12. The sixth trumpet sounds; and predictions of the successes of the Turks, and the impenitence of those who escaped their ravages, are delivered, 13—21.

AND <sup>a</sup> the fifth angel sounded, and I saw <sup>b</sup> a star fall from heaven unto the earth: and <sup>c</sup> to him was given the key of <sup>d</sup> the bottomless pit.

2 And he opened the bottomless pit; and <sup>e</sup> there arose a smoke out of the pit, as the smoke of a great furnace; <sup>f</sup> and the sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit.

Note.—(Note, 8:10,11.) There can scarcely remain a doubt, in the mind of an attentive inquirer, who has competent information on the subject, that these verses predict the rise and progress of Mohammed and his successors, as ruling over the Arabians or Saracens. Early in the seventh century, (about A. D. 606—608,) Mohammed began to aver a very extraordinary intercourse with God: declaring that the angel Gabriel was frequently sent to him, to teach a religion, which he was to propagate in the world, being an improvement and a perfecting both of the religion of Moses and of Jesus, as at first delivered, and a reformation of them from subsequent perversions and corruptions. His fabled journey to heaven was announced some years after. He pretended, that he had been predicted in the books of Moses; but that the Jews had expunged these predictions. He also declared that Jesus had foretold his coming, under the name of Almed, which signifies very illustrious, and is nearly allied to Mohammed. (It is supposed that he mistook Παροικλητος, comforter, for περικλητος, very illustrious.) These pretences are here, as it is generally agreed, described by “a star falling from the heaven to the earth;” and the emblem is the more appropriate, because he shone with a very conspicuous, though pestiferous light. The key given to him, to “open the bottomless pit,” or the abyss of hell, was a very suitable emblem of the power and influence which God was pleased to permit him to acquire, for the propagation of his satanical delusions; as if hell itself had been opened by him, and its destructive exhalations allowed to obscure the sun and infect the air. (Note, 3:7.) For this most artful, politic, and prosperous impostor, gradually acquired such ascendancy among the Arabians, or Saracens, to whom he belonged, that they not only received his religious system, but enlisted under his banner as their captain and ruler; and he led them forth to conquest, that they might by this method compel others to receive his doctrine. In this enterprise, he and his successors were so prosperous, that the light of Christianity was obscured; and many nations, where once it had shone in the clearest manner, were almost totally darkened, and infected with this smoke from the abyss.—Mohammed had never been “a star,” as that emblem marks out the ministers of Christianity; (Note, 1:12—20.) and he emerged from obscurity, acquired eminence and celebrity, and never declined from it. It has therefore been reasonably questioned, whether he could properly be denoted under the emblem of "a falling star;" or rather, according to the original, "a star which had fallen, from heaven unto the earth." (Notes, 12:7—12. Luke 10: 17—20.) An apostate Nestorian monk, called Sergius, or Balaia, has therefore been considered as this star; because he assisted Mohammed in forging his imposture, and was in many ways subservient to his designs. Thus he is supposed to have opened the abyss, and let forth the locusts and their king. (2,11.) But it may be doubted, whether so important a part, according to the general style and manner of prophecy, would be assigned to an individual comparatively obscure; of whose name few, except those who have very particularly studied Mohammed's history, have so much as heard. If "the fallen star" then means some agent distinct from Mohammed, who was his forerunner, as I conceive it does; I should fix upon the western corrupter of Christianity, whose "mystery of iniquity" had been long working, but burst forth almost at the same time with the imposture of Mohammed. (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:3—7.) The worship of images, saints, and angels, prayers for the dead, and many other of the corruptions of popery, had at this time made very great progress in Christendom. These corruptions, of which the bishop and church of Rome were the source, centre, or principal support, evidently prepared the way for Mohammed, in connexion with the wickedness of the professors and ministers of Christianity; and furnished him with his most plausible pretexts; and so the "fallen star," the western antichrist, (if that name may for brevity's sake be used,) opened the door for Mohammed and his imposture, that is, for the eastern Antichrist. It appears clearly, that not an individual, no not Mohammed, as considered apart from the Caliphs his successors, is meant, either by "the fallen star," or "the angel of the abyss;" but a succession of men, or associated bodies of men, carrying on from generation to generation the same design. And, as the corrupters of Christianity made way for the imposture of Mohammed, and the apostacy which it occasioned; who can more properly be designated by "the star fallen from heaven to earth," "and opening the abyss" than they? (See Faber, Vol. II. 29—33.)—"The Christians of the seventh century relapsed into a semblance of Paganism: their public and private vows were addressed to the relics and images, that disgraced the temples of the east. The throne of the Almighty was darkened by a crowd of martyrs and saints and angels, the objects of popular veneration: and the Collyridian heretics, who flourished in the fruitful soil of Arabia, invested the Virgin with the name and honors of a goddess." Gibbon.

locusts upon the earth: and unto them was given power, <sup>h</sup> as the scorpions of the earth have power.

5 And to them <sup>m</sup> it was given that <sup>n</sup> they should not kill them, but that <sup>o</sup> they should be tormented five months: <sup>p</sup> and their torment was as the torment of a scorpion, when he striketh a man.

Note.—"Out of the smoke" above mentioned "came locusts:" that is, great armies of Arabians, or Saracens were raised, by means of Mohammed's imposture, to spread desolations through the nations. (Notes, Ex. 10:6, 13. Joel 1:4—7. 2:4,5,7—9,18—20.) They resembled locusts in their numbers; and they came from the same regions, whence the largest swarms of those destructive insects have in all ages arisen. Locusts are said to be bred in pits and caverns; and these proceeded from "the smoke, which came out of the bottomless pit." Yet, at the same time, they also resembled scorpions, the sting of which gives extreme pain, and often proves mortal. Thus, whilst locusts destroy the fruits of the earth, yet do not hurt the bodies of men; these mystical locusts were commanded not "to hurt the grass;" or other vegetable productions; but only "those men, who had not the seal of God upon their foreheads;" and it is remarkable, that the Saracen armies were expressly laid under a similar injunction.—"When Yezed was marching with his army to invade Syria, 'Abubeker charged him with this, among other orders, Destroy no palm trees, nor burn any fields of corn; cut down no fruit trees, nor do any mischief to cattle, only such as you kill to eat.' Bp. Newton. Corrupt and hypocritical professors of Christianity were especially meant by "those men, who had not the seal of God in their foreheads;" which fully proves, that something wholly distinct from outward baptism, and exclusively belonging to true Christians, is denoted by that emblem. (Notes, 6:5,6. 7:1—3.)—Now, it is well known, that the Saracens extended their conquests principally in those countries, where the worship of saints and angels, and other corruptions of Christianity, prevailed; whilst the places, where religion was preserved more pure, were sheltered from their fury: and no doubt God permitted this scourge to come on the nations, where his gospel was perverted, for their correction or punishment.—It was also predicted, that they would be restrained from killing those, whom they were commissioned to torment: but as immense multitudes were slain by these cruel victors, this cannot with propriety be interpreted literally; and it evidently means, that they would be empowered durably to ravage, harass, and disturb the nations and the church; but not utterly to destroy them.—"They might kill them as individuals; but still 'they should not kill them as a political body, 'as a state, or empire.' Bp. Newton.—Accordingly, they miserably desolated and oppressed, both the Greek and Latin churches, and the nations in which they were established, but they could not totally extirpate them: they repeatedly besieged Constantinople, but were always repulsed; they even plundered Rome, but they could not make themselves permanently masters of it; they took from the eastern empire many of its richest provinces, but they could not utterly subvert it.—Moreover, it was predicted, that they should distress and torment mankind, during "five months;" according to the term of life, which naturalists assign to locusts (10). These months consisting of thirty days, and each day denoting a year, amount to one hundred and fifty years: and Mohammed first began publicly to propagate his imposture, A. D. 612; and A. D. 762, (just one hundred and fifty years afterwards,) the city of Bagdad was builded, the Saracens ceased from their ravages, and became a settled people; they made no more rapid conquests, and obtained no further accession to their power, which thenceforth began to decline. They then ceased to be locusts: though this "woe-trumpet" continued much longer, as it will presently be seen.—These invaders speedily conquered Palestine, Syria, Armenia, almost all Asia Minor, Persia, India, Egypt, Numidia, Barbary, Spain, Portugal, part of Italy, and the principal islands in the Mediterranean sea. Scorpions. 6 And in those days <sup>q</sup> shall men seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them.

Note.—It was also foretold, that these tremendous conquerors would cause extreme calamities and miseries to the inhabitants of the countries which they ravaged, by giving the utmost license to the cruelty, rapacity, and lust of the soldiers. So that death would appear to vast numbers more desirable than life; and the conquerors would have been more merciful if they had despatched the wretched victims of their unbridled passions than by constraining them to drag on an unwilling life; and so prolonging those miseries, which they ardently wished for death to terminate. 7 And <sup>r</sup> the shapes of the locusts were like unto horses prepared unto battle; and on their heads were as it were crowns like gold, and <sup>s</sup> their faces were as the faces of men.

9 And <sup>x</sup> they had breast-plates, as it were breast-plates of iron; <sup>y</sup> and the sound of their wings was as the sound of chariots of many horses running to battle.

10 And they had <sup>z</sup> tails like unto scorpions, and there were stings in their tails: and their power was to hurt men five months.

Note.—The shape of these figurative "locusts" was next described: they resembled horses; as indeed locusts do, especially in their heads. Now the Arabians were remarkable for their skill in horsemanship, and their chief force lay in cavalry. (Note, Joel 2:1—6.) The "crowns on their heads like gold," may denote the turbans, which the Arabians have always worn; or it may refer to the many kingdoms, which they subjected to their dominion. They had "faces, like men;" but they wore their hair like women, plaited, or flowing down their backs; and the Arabians are known to have done this. The "teeth, as of lions," which are ascribed to them, represented their strength and fury to destroy; whilst their "breast-plates of iron" showed their care to protect themselves, by defensive armor, that is, by the most effectual public measures. The sound of their wings prefigured the fury with which they assaulted their enemies, and the rapidity of their conquests. But though they devoured and caused desolations, like locusts; yet the principal mischief which they did was effected by their tails, in which they had "stings like those of scorpions;" for wherever they extended their conquests, they left behind them the poison of their abominable religion: so that the consequences of their victories were far more mischievous, than the slaughter made by them.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The king over these locusts, who was "the angel of the abyss," or a messenger from the abyss, may signify their Caliphs in succession, who were the chief priests of their religion, the commanders of their armies, and their emperors. The name of this king, even "the destroyer," (for so the word means in both languages,) was peculiarly suitable to a succession of rulers, who murdered both the bodies and souls of men, by the same malignant expeditions; as they seemed to be Satan the first murderer's vicegerents and visible representatives upon earth.—Every circumstance of this emblematical prediction so exactly accords to the Saracens, and so little suits the church or hierarchy of Rome, or any of their religious orders, (who gained their advantage by priest-craft, not by arms,) that there can be no propriety in attempting to explain it of them; especially as they are described with sufficient precision in what follows. It also serves to fix the order of time, in respect of the predicted events.

15 And the four angels were loosed, which were prepared * for <sup>i</sup> an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year, <sup>k</sup> for to slay the third part of men.

Note.—The “voice of the horns of the altar,” on which incense used to be burned, strongly indicated, that the judgments about to be predicted were appointed to punish men for corrupting the gospel, and so turning it into “the savor of death” and condemnation. (Notes, 8:1—6. 2 Cor. 2:14—17.)—After the sixth angel had sounded his trumpet, he was ordered to “loose the four angels, who had been bound near the Euphrates;” which was done accordingly. This is explained, by the most approved interpreters according to the emblematical style of the prophecy, to be a prediction, that the Turks, or Othmans, who had hitherto been restrained beyond the Euphrates, would be released from that restraint, and proceed to make conquests to the west of that river. The only material objection to this interpretation is drawn from the distance of time, which intervened between the events before predicted, and the victorious invasions of the Turks. But this is readily answered, by observing, that “the three woe-trumpets” must necessarily take in all the intervening time, between the subversion of the western empire, and the destruction of the beast, which is yet to be expected. (Note, 11:13,14.) The Saracens continued to possess, though they did not extend, their dominions, till the Turks supplanted them, and all this time properly belongs to the first woe-trumpet. Indeed no other events can be found in history, satisfactorily correspondent to the discoveries made after this second woe-trumpet; nor any other, which will not leave a far greater distance, between it and the third woe-trumpet, than this interpretation leaves between the first and the second. (Note, 11:15—18.)—The Turks pouring into Persia, and the regions bordering on the Euphrates, in the eleventh century, established four sultanies, or kingdoms, in those parts; but they were prevented from making further conquests; especially by the Croisades, or religious wars, waged in that and the two following centuries, by the western Christians, who attempted to wrest Palestine out of the hands of the infidels. But when these ruinous projects were finally abandoned, the “four angels which had been bound in the Euphrates,” who were emblems of these four sultanies, “were loosed.” Then the Turks, uniting together, began their ravages and victories; and made great havoc among the inhabitants of that part of the world, which had constituted the Roman empire, and which we have often read of, as “the third part of men.” (Note, 8:7.) The western empire had been broken to pieces under the four first trumpets; (Notes, 8:) the eastern had been nearly ruined under the fifth; and under the sixth it was finally subverted. The Turks conquered all the countries, which had belonged to it. A. D. 1453 they took Constantinople, and thus brought to an end the whole Imperial power, which originally belonged to Rome.—These powers were prepared for a certain fixed time, which being computed by a year for each day, according to the prophetic manner, and twelve months of thirty days each being allowed to the year here mentioned, that is, 360, days or years; thirty more being added for the month, and one for the day; the whole amounts to 391 years and fifteen days. Now the first conquest of the Turks over the Christians took place A. D. 1281; and the last success by which they extended their dominions, was A. D. 1672; being exactly 391 years from the one to the other. So that one of their historians (Prince Cantemir) here divides his narrative, calling the former part ‘The growth of the Othman empire,’ the latter ‘The decay of the Othman empire.’ Since that period, they have had little success in any of their wars; and their power is so much weakened and straitened at present, by the rival power of Russia, that it is not at all probable, they will ever recover their ascendancy, or renew their conquests. Had we records of these events sufficiently exact, we should no doubt find, that the half hour, or fifteen days, was fixed with the same punctuality by the Spirit of prophecy.—Though the term of their “slaying the third part of men,” or that during which they would extend their ravages and conquests, was predicted; yet that of the duration of their empire was not; but it will end after the sounding of the third woe-trumpet. (11:14.)—‘Dr. Lloyd, ... bishop of Worcester, who has now, for above twenty years, been studying the Revelations, with an amazing diligence and exactness, had long before this year said, The peace, between the Turks and the papal Christians, was certainly to be made in the year 1698, which he made out thus; the four angels, mentioned in ... Revelation, that were bound in the river Euphrates, which he explains to be the captains of the Turkish forces, that till then were subject to the sultan at Babylon, were to be loosed, and freed from that yoke, and set up for themselves. And

'these were prepared to slay the third part of 'men, for an hour, a day, a month, and a year. 'He reckons the year in St. John, as the Julian 'year of three hundred and sixty-five days; a 'month is thirty of these days, and a day makes 'one: which added to the former number makes 'three hundred and ninety-six. Now he proves 'from historians, that Ottoman came, and be- 'gan his conquests at Prouse, in the year 1302; 'to which the former number, in which they 'were to slay the third part of men, being ad- 'ded, it must end in the year 1698. And 'though the historians do not mark the hour, 'or the twelfth part of the day, or year; yet he 'is confident, if that ever is known, that the 'prophecy will be found, in that, to be punc- 'tually accomplished. After this, he thinks, 'their time of hurting the papal Christians is 'at an end. They may indeed still do mischief 'to the Muscovites, or persecute their own 'Christian subjects, but they can do no more 'hurt to the papalins.' Bp. Burnet's History of his own time.—In several subordinate partic- ulars this statement differs from that above given; which seems to be the more exact, both as to the beginning of the Othmans' successes, and the close of them; and also of the method by which the time should be computed. Yet the grand outline of interpretation is the same: and, considering the date of bishop Lloyd's conclusions, which preceded the final successes of the Othmans, but which have, for substance, been verified for much above a hundred years, they may justly be considered as extraordinary; and as an important proof of the true meaning of the prophecy, and of its exact accomplishment. (Note, 16:12—16.)

Note.—The number of the army of horsemen was declared to be "two hundred millions;" (δύο μυριάδες μυριάδων, twice ten thousand times ten thousand;) that is, an immense multitude, a very large definite number being put for an indefinite. (Note, 5:11—14.) Accordingly the Turks brought vast armies into the field, often to the amount of four, five, six, or seven hundred thousand men, chiefly cavalry: and when the whole multitude of those is considered, who were employed in this manner during the conquests of 391 years, we shall see the propriety of the apostle's strong prophetic language.

18 By these three was <sup>s</sup>the third part of men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the brimstone, which issued out of their mouths.

19 For their power is in their mouth, and <sup>t</sup>in their tails: for their tails were like unto serpents, and had heads, and with them they do hurt.

Note.—The apostle likewise saw both "the horses and their riders," in his vision, as having "breast-plates of fire, hyacinth, and brimstone;" which may be considered as representing the scarlet, blue, and yellow colors, for which they have always been remarkable. The horses' heads, like those of lions, denoted their strength, courage and fierceness: and "the fire, smoke, and brimstone, which issued out of their mouths, and killed the third part of men," appears to me an evident and most astonishing prediction of the use of gunpowder and of artillery, which were first invented about this period, and which the Turks employed with great success in their wars, especially in the siege of Constantinople; when immensely large guns were used, so that one of them is said to have carried a stone of three hundred pounds weight. By these the walls of that city were at length battered down, which made way for the final destruction of that empire.—These tremendous conquerors, before whom desolation marched, and from whose mouths "fire, and smoke, and brimstone issued," not only slew men in battle, when they faced them; but they had tails like serpents, with heads upon them, with which they hurt men, as by an envenomed bite. That is, the Othmans or Turks left behind them, wherever they went, the same poisonous and ruinous religion, which the Saracens had done before them; and this proved more durably mischievous than their most bloody conquests. So that the remains of the Greek church, and of Christianity in those countries, were almost wholly extirpated; and Mohammedism became universally prevalent, and indeed continues so to this day, in that part of the world, in which the gospel had been for a long time most signally successful.—Tails. (19) Note, 7—10, v. 10.

Note.—"The rest of the men," who were not destroyed, or compelled to become Moham-medans, by the above mentioned calamities, did not repent of their evil works. The Latin or Roman church, which escaped this destruction, still persisted in the idolatrous worship of demons, or angels and departed saints, real or fictitious, by which devils are virtually worshipped; (Notes, Dan. 11:38. 1 Tim. 4:1-5.) in their stupid adoration of senseless images, for which they have no better plea to use than the Pagans had; in their "murders," massacres, and bloody wars with heretics, so called, and their execrable persecutions; in their "sorceries," or pretended revelations and miracles; and in "their fornication;" forbidding marriage, yet conniving at concubinage in the clergy; binding numbers by vows to a single life, and yet licensing brothels by public authority of the Pope, in Rome itself; and in "their thefts," or those exactions and impositions, by which they fraudulently, oppressively, and iniquitously drew immense treasures from the nations. (Notes, 13:11-17. 16:10,11. 17:1-6.) The eastern church, in which many corruptions first prevailed, was punished by the first woe of the Saracens; and as this did not bring them to repentance, the second woe of the Turks or Othmans completed its ruin. But the western church, not repenting of her abominations, will at length be overwhelmed with the third woe. For the reformation from popery, and all that has hitherto taken place in these western regions, has amounted only to the "two witnesses," (Note, 11:3-6.) protesting against the prevailing abominations: and the prevalence of infidelity, skepticism, and heresy, in proportion to the supposed decline of popery and superstition, gives no just room to suppose, that matters are very much improved in the western church. In this skeptical, profane, licentious, and superficial age, indeed, Satan has evidently changed his ground; but the scriptural Christian will readily perceive, that he has hitherto in great measure maintained it.—The persevering idolatry in the remains of the Greek church and elsewhere, and the iniquity of professed Christians, notwithstanding the desolations made among them by the Saracens and Turks, renders the prophecy more circumstantial, and the exact accomplishment of it more wonderful. The very things which infidels urge, as objections to the divine original of Christianity, are expressly predicted in the New Testament, and demonstrate its divine inspiration.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-11.

The Lord frequently sees good to punish the abuse of spiritual advantages, by spiritual judgments; leaving "the sun, and the air, to be darkened with the smoke of the infernal pit," and the word of the gospel to be withdrawn, or corrupted, by the artifices of Satan; because men would not walk in the light, while they enjoyed it. "A fallen star," some apostate endowed with abilities and possessed of influence, often proves Satan's instrument in blinding and deceiving mankind. This judgment, however, would for the present be little regarded, if other visitations were not connected with it: but, sooner or later, devouring locusts and tormenting scorpions will come out of the baleful smoke; and the prevalence of false religion against the truth of Christ will make way for such calamities on guilty nations, as may render life itself a burden, and death the only apparent and desired relief.—In the future world, all the wicked will be tormented, but not killed: they will desire in vain to sink into non-existence: in this sense "death shall flee from them," and they shall never overtake it. As we ought to "fear him, who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell," far more "than them that can only kill the body;" so those destroyers are most to be dreaded, who act as "angels of the bottomless pit," and vicegerents of Satan, by diffusing pernicious heresies and impostures, contrary to the pure doctrine of Christ. For that grand deceiver, which, "transformed into an angel of light," and his ministers when they appear to be teachers of righteousness, do far more mischief to mankind, than the most barbarous and successful warriors could ever accomplish: but he who murders at once both the souls and bodies of men, most completely merits the title of Abaddon, Apollyon, the Destroyer.

V. 12-21.

We may rejoice, that the Lord has "a hook in the nose, and a bridle in the mouth" of every boasting enemy, by whatever method he threatens to subvert his cause. He gives deceivers or destroyers power, till his own purposes of judgment or correction are accomplished; and then he cuts them off, or lays them aside, at his pleasure. Thus one woe comes after another, on hypocrites and corrupt churches; but they "who have the seal of God in their foreheads" cannot be hurt: for the Lord binds and looses, limits or enlarges, increases or diminishes nations and their rulers, "according to the counsel of his own will." The attentive reader of scripture and of history may therefore find his faith and hope increased by those events, which in other respects fill his heart with horror and anguish, and suffuse his cheeks with floods of tears: while he contemplates men's ingenuity and indefatigable industry in the work of destruction, and in extending misery among their fellow creatures; and while he observes, that the rest of men, who escape these plagues, repent not of their evil works, but go on with their idolatries, impiety, infidelity, iniquity, oppression, cruelty, and licentiousness, "till wrath come upon them also to the uttermost."

CHAP. X.

The apostle in vision beholds a mighty Angel, with a little book open in his hand; and hears the voice of seven thunders, which he was ordered to seal up, 1-4. The Angel swears by the eternal Creator, that at an appointed time, after the sounding of the seventh trumpet, the mystery of God shall be finished, 5-7. The apostle receives and eats the little book, 8-11.

AND I saw <sup>a</sup> another mighty Angel come down from heaven, <sup>b</sup> clothed with a cloud: <sup>c</sup> and a rainbow was upon his head, <sup>d</sup> and his face was as it were the sun, and his feet as <sup>e</sup> pillars of fire:

Ex. 1:28. Acts 26:13. d 1:16. Dan. 10:6. Matt. 17:2. e 1:15. Cant. 5:15.

Note.—In the conclusion of the former chapter, the apostle had received some intimations, concerning the pertinacious corruptions of the western church, and other professed Christians, during the period of the two preceding trumpets: but before he was made acquainted with the events which would follow the sounding of the seventh trumpet, he was shown something more of the state of that church, in the ages previous to this grand event. This information was introduced by a most august and consolatory vision. Being, in his own apprehension, on earth, he saw another “mighty Angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud” to veil the splendor of his appearance, and as an emblem of the darkness of the dispensations which were predicted; “a rainbow,” signifying “the covenant of grace,” surrounded his head; his “face shone like the sun, and his legs were as pillars of fire.” (Notes, 1:12—20. 4:1—3.) This mighty Angel must be either Christ himself, or an emblematical display of his glory.

3 And cried with <sup>h</sup>a loud voice, as when a lion roareth: and when he had cried, <sup>i</sup>seven thunders uttered their voices.

4 And when the seven thunders had uttered their voices, <sup>k</sup>I was about to write: and I heard a voice from heaven, saying unto me, <sup>l</sup>Seal up those things which the seven thunders uttered, and write them not.

Note.—The angel, thus introduced, held in his hand “a little book” as containing the Revelation of the purposes of God, which he was about to communicate to his servant. This was distinct from the larger book before mentioned, being a kind of appendix or codicil to it. (Note, 5:1—4.) Or it might be one of the seven parts of that book, which as some think, might each be called “a little book.” It had been sealed, but appeared as having been opened: and contained a part of “the book before spoken of,” though thus introduced separately, to call and fix the attention. At least it perfectly coincided with the contents of it. Several respectable interpreters suppose this little book to have contained all the following parts of “the Revelation;” and thus they make it much greater, than all the rest of the book, of which Christ opened the seals: containing (as some of them suppose,) all which should take place after the sounding of the seventh trumpet: whereas the former part of the next chapter, and all the two following chapters at least, belong to the sixth trumpet. These are objections against that arrangement, to which I could never find a satisfactory answer: besides, the great book would end abruptly in the middle of the sixth trumpet; and the same subject would be as abruptly taken up in “the little book.” It therefore appears to me, that this little book contained no more, than the former part of the next chapter; (Notes, 11:1—14.) which was an important appendix to the ninth chapter, as it gives a general account of the state of the western church, and all connected with it, during the period of the fifth and sixth trumpets. Then the former subject proceeds, the seventh trumpet is sounded, and a compendious view is given of the subsequent events to the end of the world. (Note, 11:15—18.) After this the second part of the book is introduced; (Note, 11:19.) and the apostle is shown a great variety of events, tending to explain those, which had before been predicted, in a more summary manner: but chiefly relative to the state of the church, as the former part had been to those which concerned the empire. This arrangement, which is nearly the same with that adopted by Bishop Newton, makes no material alteration in the plan of the celebrated Mr. Mede, and those who have followed him; while it avoids the difficulty of making the little book by far the largest, and the necessity of dividing the sixth trumpet, between the two books. Still every event is referred to the times, to which, according to the synchronisms of that able and laborious writer, it belongs, and which are evidently deduced, not from vague hypotheses, but from the internal construction of the prophecy itself. And the observation of another learned writer, Bp. Hurd, stands equally good: ‘The knowledge of this order is a great restraint on the fancy of an expositor, who is not now at liberty to apply the prophecies to events of any time to which they may appear to suit; but to events only falling within that time, to which they belong, in the course of this predetermined method: and if to this restriction we add another, which arises from the necessity of applying not one, but many prophecies, to the same time; we can hardly conceive how an interpretation should keep clear of all these impediments, and make its way through so many interfering checks, unless it were the true one. Just as when a lock (to use Mr. Mede’s allusion,) is composed of many and intricate wards; the key, that easily turns within them, and opens the lock, can only be that which properly belongs to it.’—Since I first wrote these remarks, expositors have arisen, (especially the pious and learned Mr. Faber,) who suppose, that the little book contained the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth chapters of Revelation. But, after very much consideration, I feel constrained to dissent from this opinion, however respectably supported. First, because it makes the little book, or codicil, bear a too great proportion to the whole prophecy. The prophetic chapters, properly speaking, are only twelve; namely, the sixth, eighth, ninth, eleventh, to the fourteenth inclusive, and the sixteenth to the twentieth inclusive: for the seventh, tenth, and fifteenth contain not much explicit prediction; and the two last chapters, succeeding, as it appears to me, the day of judgment, are rather descriptive of the heavenly state, than prophetic, in the ordinary sense of the word. Now the four chapters, assigned to the little book, not being very short, yet crowded with most important predictions, contain at least a third of the whole prophecy; which is more than can properly be assigned to “the little book.” Secondly, the eleventh chapter evidently carries on the prediction, in a general manner, to the Millennium, and indeed to the end of the world. (Note, 11:15-18.) Now, the succeeding chapters to the twentieth, plainly treat of times previous to the Millennium. The prophet must, therefore somewhere go back to take a more particular view of his subject, than he at first gave: but no place can be assigned for this, so satisfactorily, as the close of the eleventh chapter. The course of predicted events cannot be successive, in those chapters; therefore some of them must be coincident. Thirdly, no interpretation of the former verses of the twelfth chapter, gives the least satisfaction, except that which recalls the reader's attention to the events, which took place when pagan persecution terminated, the Roman emperors professed Christianity; and further corruptions, calamities, and persecutions, sprang from that very source, which seemed to promise far happier days. I therefore am most decidedly of opinion, that "the little book" contains only the first fourteen verses of the next chapter, to the close of the sixth trumpet; being coincident, as to the state of things in the west, with that of the eastern empire, as predicted in the ninth chapter. I am not, however, unwilling to concede, that the following verses, to the close of the eighteenth, may be assigned to it, as a general pre-intimation of the final success of that cause, which had so long been trampled under foot. Several objections to this interpretation will be obviated as we proceed.—The mighty Angel above described, "set his right foot on the sea, and his left on the dry land," to denote his sovereign authority over the whole terraqueous globe: and perhaps intimating his determination of spreading the gospel through every part of it: and he demanded attention, with a loud voice like the roaring of a lion; to show the power and terror of his word to his obstinate enemies. After this seven thunders were heard, which in the most majestic manner uttered intelligible voices: these either related to matters proper for the apostle to know, but not proper to be published; or else they are coincident with some things, which are afterwards more clearly revealed. They were, however, ordered to be sealed up, and it does not become us to inquire any further concerning them.

7 But <sup>r</sup> in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, <sup>s</sup> the mystery of God should be finished, <sup>t</sup> as he hath declared to his servants the prophets

Note.—The apostle next saw the mighty Angel "lift up his hand to heaven," as it was customary to do when solemn oaths were taken; (Notes, Deut. 32:40-42. Dan. 12:5-9.) and heard him swear by the self-existent, eternal Creator of all things, (Note, 4:9-11. Marg. Ref. o, p,) "that there should be time no longer;" or as it may be rendered, that "the time should not be yet;" that is, the time of those glorious things, with which "the mystery of God would be finished." Further delays must be expected: till at length, in "the days of the seventh angel," after he had begun to sound his trumpet, that would be accomplished, according to the predictions of former prophets; namely, as it may be supposed from the subsequent part of the book, in the destruction of every opposing power, and the universal prevalence of true religion; which would continue, with little interruption, to the consummation of all things, and so terminate in the eternal state. (Notes, 11:15-18. 18:-20:) But before those events began to take place, other preparatory transactions must occur; and this solemn declaration seems to have been intended to teach Christians, in the intervening ages, to wait with patience, and to expect a happy event of the calamities of the church, though the time of it seem long delayed. (Notes, Dan. 7:9-14, 23-27. 8:13,14. 12:5-13.)—If we adhere to our translation, the meaning must be, that all the subsequent events, to the end of time, would fall under the period of the seventh trumpet.—Liveth, &c. CHAP. XI.

Note.—(Notes, Ez. 3:1—3,12—15.) The apostle's "eating the book," was an emblem of his duly considering and understanding it; and thus making it his own, as it were, to the purposes for which he received it. The knowledge of future events was at first very sweet to him, as honey to the taste; (Notes, 5:1—4. Jer. 13:16—18.) but when he had more fully understood them, they occasioned him inward grief and anguish of heart. By publishing the contents of this little book, and the rest of the predictions, which he was about to receive, he has indeed "prophesied before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings," and does so to this very day, in all the languages into which the scriptures have been or shall be translated; and in all the countries in which they are circulated.

Make bitter. (9) Πικραει. 8:11. Col. 3:19. It is used figuratively for whatever excites uneasy and painful sensations.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The divine Surety of the new covenant, who "purchased the church with his own blood," manages all things in heaven and earth with uncontrollable authority. His power and his word are most terrible to his enemies; but the believer can have no reason to fear his unchangeable Friend; for he will communicate those discoveries and consolations to him, which are kept secret from all others. (Notes, Ps. 25:14. John 15:12—16.)—The final salvation of the righteous, and the final prevalence of true religion on earth, are engaged for by the same unfailing word of the Lord: and, though "the time shall not be yet," we have solid ground to conclude, that "the sounding of the seventh trumpet" is near at hand, when glorious scenes will be exhibited. Very soon, however, to us, "time shall be no more:" but if we are believers, a happy eternity will follow; and we shall look down from heaven, to behold and rejoice in the triumphs of Christ, and his cause on earth. Let us then rely on the unchangeable word and oath of the Lord, for strong consolation amidst all our trials; let us attend to and obey the voice from heaven, which calls us from the attractions of things present, that we may consider "the things which shall be hereafter." Let us seek our instructions from Christ, and obey his orders; daily meditating on his word, and so digesting it, and turning it into nourishment to our own souls; and then declaring it to those around us, according to the duties of our several stations. Indeed the sweetness of such contemplations will often be mingled or followed with bitterness; while we compare the scriptures with the state of the world, and the church, or even with that of our own hearts. Yet, if we have scriptural ground to conclude, that we are interested in the salvation of Christ; and if we be employed in any measure for the good of others; we should not so much regard our present feelings, as the glory of God in our eternal happiness, in that of those with whom we are connected, and in the salvation of sinners in all the regions of the whole earth.

The apostle is directed to measure the temple, the altar, and the worshippers; but to leave the "outer court to the Gentiles;" with a prediction of their prevalence for forty-two months, 1,2. Power is given to two witnesses, who prophesy in sackcloth, during twelve hundred and sixty days, 3—6. The beast makes war upon them, and slays them; but after three days and a half, they arise, and ascend into heaven, 7—12. Divine judgments overtake their enemies, 13,14. The seventh trumpet sounds; and a discovery is made of the glorious events which shall follow, 15—18. An introduction to the prophecies of the subsequent chapter, 19.

Note.—It has before been supposed, that the former part of this chapter exhibits the contents of the little book; (Notes, 10:2—4.) which represents the state of the western church, during the two preceding woe-trumpets, and before the sounding of the seventh trumpet (15); and this fixes the chronology of it.—The discoveries of this little book are related under emblematical appearances and actions, as before. The scene is the temple; and "a reed," like a "measuring rod," being given to the apostle, he was ordered to measure the temple, the altar, and the worshippers in the inner court. (Notes, Ez. 27:9—19. Ez. 40:3.) This denoted that, in the predicted period, there would be a small number, whose doctrine, worship, and behavior, would bear measuring by the word of God; and that these only would be acceptable interior worshippers: whereas "the outer court," being left by express command unmeasured, and "given unto the Gentiles," emphatically showed, that the greatest number of professed Christians would be formal, superstitious, and idolatrous worshippers; Christians only in name, but Gentiles in wickedness, and even in idolatry. The "holy city" also, being "trodden under foot" by them, implied that the church at large, and its most lucrative and eminent places, would be filled with idolaters, infidels, and hypocrites, and that true Christians would be oppressed in a grievous manner. The duration of these evil times was fixed to forty-two months, or twelve hundred and sixty days, which by prophetic computation are so many years. (Notes, Dan. 7:23—27. 8:9—14. 12:5—13.) The whole of Daniel's prophecies should be compared with the subsequent parts of this book, as the same events and dates are intended in both; and this gives a measure of certainty to the interpretation. Daniel also fixes these events to the remains of the fourth monarchy, after it was broken to pieces, and formed ten kingdoms; and this determines the geography of them especially to the western empire, which was properly the seat of that monarchy. So that the outlines, both of the time and place, to which these prophecies belonged, are unalterably determined, by the prophets themselves: nor can the accomplishment of them be referred to any other times or places, without doing the most manifest violence to them in both respects. Indeed the prophecies of Daniel, and those of the apostle, when properly explained, and compared with each other and with their accomplishment, constitute the fullest imaginable demonstration of the truth of the scripture. But demonstration itself cannot convince those, who will not bestow due pains to examine it.—The beginning of these twelve hundred and sixty years must be placed subsequent to the first four trumpets, on the subversion of the western empire, which was completed A. D. 566. This made way for the pope, in process of time, to acquire a vast accession of ecclesiastical dominion. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:3—7.) He became universal bishop, A. D. 606; and was fully established as a temporal prince, A. D. 756. Did we know exactly at what time to date the beginning of the twelve hundred and sixty years, we might show with certainty when they would terminate: but this would not consist with that wise obscurity, which always in some respects rests on prophecies, before they are fulfilled. Till the event, therefore, shall explain this matter, it must be left undetermined: but perhaps the beginning of the rise and of the fall of this antichristian tyranny, and the completion of them, may both be at the distance of twelve hundred and sixty years from each other; as in more than one way the Babylonish captivity lasted seventy years. (Notes, 2 Kings 24:1,8—16. Ezra 1:1—4. Dan. 1:1,2.) The beginning however of these years cannot well be fixed sooner than A. D. 606, nor later than A. D. 756. It is, indeed, far from probable, that the beginning fell so late as this; but that it did not much precede 606, will I think afterwards appear. (Note, 7—12.)—Measuring the servants of God is equivalent to sealing them.—The unmeasured ‘tenants of the outer court, and the unsealed ‘men throughout the Roman empire, are alike ‘the votaries of the apostacy: while they that ‘were measured, and they that were sealed, are ‘the saints who refused to be partakers of his ‘abominations.’ Faber.

5 And if any man will hurt them, <sup>r</sup> fire proceedeth out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies: and if any man will hurt them, he must in this manner be killed.

6 These have <sup>s</sup> power to shut heaven; that it rain not in the days of their prophecy: and <sup>t</sup> have power over waters to turn them to blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues, as often as they will.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—It would be tedious even to mention the conjectural explanations, which have been given of this prophecy concerning the witnesses: but they generally and notoriously violate the apostle’s rule; (Notes, 2 Pet. 1:20,21.) not proceeding upon a large and comprehensive view of the subject, but confining the interpretation to private, and comparatively little events. A “king,” in prophetic language, commonly means a succession of monarchs: a “witness,” therefore, must be explained by the same rule; and not individuals, but a succession of men, who, during the period referred to, bore testimony to the truth, must be intended by the prophecy. “Two witnesses” were mentioned, because one was insufficient for the legal proof of any fact. (Notes, Deut. 17:2—7, v. 6. 19:15—21, v. 15.) For these “witnesses” would be as few, as could suffice to attest the true gospel, and to enter a public protest against the antichristian perversions of it: perhaps Moses and Aaron, Elijah and Elisha, and the apostles and seventy disciples, sent forth “two and two,” might be alluded to. All real Christians, who boldly professed their religion, may be considered as uniting in this testimony: yet ministers, and especially bold and zealous men, who attempted reformation, were “the witnesses” primarily intended. The Angel before mentioned (1), even the Lord Jesus, declared that he would “give them power,” or authority, “to prophesy,” during the assigned time; yet “in sackcloth,” as expressive of their afflicted persecuted state, and of their deep concern and sorrow of heart, on account of the abominations against which they protested.—It has been shown by many writers, that during the darkest ages of popery, men were raised up, who bore a decided testimony against the prevailing corruptions of the Roman church, and for the leading doctrines of the gospel. It was indeed the interest and the constant practice of their opponents, to silence their testimony, to blacken their characters, or to destroy them as heretics: yet, after all their endeavors to suppress, misrepresent, and mutilate their writings; enough remains to show, that Christ had a remnant of faithful witnesses and disciples, through all the ages intended, even to this day. From the eighth to the eleventh century inclusive, we find accounts of individuals, or collective bodies, who, under the brand of heresy, and in the face of persecution, evidently held, and openly professed, the great doctrines of salvation by faith in Christ, and through his mediation, merits, and grace; and protested against the abuses of popery: and these, who just prevented the total darkness of that gloomy period, could by no means be extirpated. On the contrary, they continued to increase in many places: in the valleys of Piedmont especially, vast multitudes were collected, and called Waldenses, and Albigenses, who were evidently Calvinists, (to speak in modern language,) more or less moderate, and consistent in their views; and their lives were generally exemplary, as some of the Papists themselves have allowed. These subsisted during the twelfth, thirteenth, and following centuries: though they were persecuted with such unrelenting fury, and pursued with such cruel and destructive wars, that in France alone, a million of them are computed to have been slain, for the sole crime of protesting against the tyranny of the Pope, and the corruptions of the church of Rome! They, however, continued to "prophesy in sackcloth;" and when driven from Piedmont, they settled in other places, propagated their religion, and prepared the way for the Reformation. Connected with them, and agreed in their leading doctrines, and in opposition to the church of Rome, were the Lollards in England; and the Bohemians, from among whom arose John Huss and Jerom of Prague, who were burnt in the fifteenth century by the council of Constance. Multitudes embraced the doctrines of the gospel in different places, during those times, and professed or preached it at the hazard of their lives; and great numbers were burnt or put to death in the most cruel manner, for so doing.—"The visible assemblies of the Paulicians, or Albigeois were extirpated by fire and sword; and the bleeding remnant escaped by flight, concealment, or catholic conformity. But the invincible spirit which they had kindled still lived and breathed in the western world.—In the state, in the church, and even in the cloister, a latent succession was preserved of the disciples of St. Paul, who protested against the tyranny of Rome, embraced the Bible as the rule of faith, and purified their creed from all the visions of the Gnostic theology. The struggles of Wickliff in England, and of Huss in Bohemia, were premature and ineffectual: but the names of Zuinglius, Luther, and Calvin, are pronounced with gratitude as the deliverers of nations!" Gibbon.—"How striking a testimony is here given, by an enemy of Christianity, to the fulfilment of prophecy! Gibbon writing an involuntary comment on St. John!" Cunninghame. At length Luther arose, and the reformation took place; since which time, the same testimony for the truth of Christ, and against the errors of Antichrist, has been maintained. Nor does it appear, that the term is yet expired; for "they shall prophesy 1260 days clothed in sackcloth." The term of their "prophesying in sackcloth," before they "are slain and rise again," (Note, 7—12.) must extend through the whole of the forty and two months, and cannot terminate till these are ended. This is wonderfully overlooked by many expositors, who inconsistently suppose the witnesses to have finished their "testimony in sackcloth," and having been slain, to have risen again; at a time, when, by their own computation, the 1260 years were not closed. The witnesses are not indeed at present exposed to such terrible sufferings, as in former times: but those scenes may be re-acted before long, for what any man can foreknow; and they have abundant cause "to prophesy in sackcloth," on account of the declined state of religion even in the protestant churches.—However, though men despised and hated the witnesses, they were in reality "the two olive-trees," endued with spiritual gifts and grace, that through their instrumentality, others also might receive "the unction from the Holy One;" and "the two candlesticks," to hold forth the light of divine truth in this benighted world: they stood to minister with acceptance, "before the God of the earth," the Proprietor and Governor of all mankind; and were the champions, as it were, of his cause, and the heralds of his glory, in the countries where they lived. (Notes, 1: 12—20. Zech. 4:2,3,11—14.) Moreover, if any man, being enraged by their testimony, and emboldened by their apparent weakness, should attempt to injure them; "fire proceedeth from their mouths, and devoureth their enemies," who would in this manner be slain: that is, the Lord would certainly plead and avenge their cause, and resent the injuries done to them, as done against himself. (Notes, Zech. 2:6—9. Acts 9:3—6.) Their warnings and instructions would tend to the condemnation of those, who hated them on that account: the denunciations of divine vengeance, uttered by them, would infallibly be accomplished; and even their prayers would be answered in judgments on those, who persisted in their enmity. For, in this respect, they would have power, like Elijah, "to shut heaven, and to restrain the rain from falling," during "the three years and a half" of their prophesying; (Notes, 1 Kings 17:1. Jam. 5:16—18.) or to prevent blessings coming from above on those, who rejected their testimony and persecuted them for it: as well as to "turn the waters into blood," or to inflict all other plagues at their pleasure, as Moses did upon the Egyptians. (Notes, Ex. 7:15—25.) That is, they would have as great an interest in heaven, as the most eminent of the prophets; and God would as surely punish those nations, princes, or persons, who injured them, as he did those who had formerly oppressed his people, or murdered his messengers.

7 And <sup>u</sup> when they shall have finished their testimony, <sup>x</sup> the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them, and shall overcome them, and kill them.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—When these witnesses "shall have finished," or "shall be about to finish," their testimony; "the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit," (that is, the persecuting power, which will afterwards be more fully described, Notes, 13:1—7. 17:7,8.) shall fight against them, and "kill them." Many private interpretations, (for so they appear to me,) have been given of this passage, as if it related to the martyrdom of individuals, or partial persecutions, in past times; and some strangely imagine, that it only denotes the constant persecution of true Christians, through the whole period of twelve hundred and sixty years: I cannot, however, but think, that it relates to events yet future; and the fulfilment of it must be nearly at the same time, as the sounding of the seventh trumpet.—"The great city," in the street of which the dead bodies of the witnesses shall lie unburied, does not seem to mean either Rome or Jerusalem literally; but Jerusalem mystically; that is, the professing church of God, as possessed by Gentiles (2); and so become the rival of "Sodom" in lewdness; of "Egypt" in cruelty to the children of God; and of "Jerusalem" at the time when Christ was there crucified, in general enmity to him and his cause. Yet the arrangement of the prophecy in other respects shows, that the countries, which belonged to the church of Rome, when at the height of its power, and most prosperous in its rage, "for crucifying our Lord afresh" in his people, were principally intended: and indeed it is worthy of notice, that though our Lord personally was crucified at Jerusalem, it was by the authority of the Roman emperor, when Judea was a province of that empire.—Present appearances, indeed, in some degree may seem to favor the opinion, that this general and successful war of the beast against the witnesses of Christ, will be conducted under another form, and other pretences, and perhaps by other instruments and means, than former assaults have been. Papal persecutors were often concealed infidels; and infidels concealed under any other mask, and so opposing vital Christianity within the same district, may perhaps equally answer to the prediction: for the peculiar opinions of this anti-christian power are not here specified, and the apostle elsewhere speaks of antichrist as one, who opposes the doctrine, the authority, or glory of Christ. (Notes, 1 John 2:18—25. 4:1—3.) The prevalence of infidelity in different forms, throughout Europe, and the zeal, with which principles of that tendency are every where propagated, when contrasted with the declining state of Popish superstition, renders it not wholly improbable, that "the beast" may change his ground and method of attack, before he thus prevails against the witnesses; for that time approaches: though popery itself is far more deeply rooted in a vast proportion of professed Christians, than is generally supposed; and seems at present (1815) greatly prevailing against open infidelity, nay, I fear nominal protestantism.—It likewise appears from the prediction, that the temporary victory of this enemy over the truth will be so entire, throughout the extent of the western church, that there will be scarcely any open profession or preaching of the true gospel, or steady opposition to the prevailing antichristianity, in all that part of the world: so that the different nations of Europe, and others as connected with them, will have nothing to do, but to contemplate and insult "over the dead bodies of the witnesses," which they will not suffer to be buried. This may signify, that they will revile and deride all those, who before had professed and preached the truth; and thus preserve them from oblivion, by exposing them to ignominy. At the same time, they will use the customary methods of mutual congratulation on an event, which they deem so joyful: supposing that they have at last finally extirpated a race of men, whose examples, doctrines, warnings, and reproofs, alarmed and disquieted their minds, and prevented them from proceeding without disturbance, in their ungodliness and iniquity. (Notes, Judg. 16:23—31. Mic. 7:3—10. Matt. 27:39—44. John 7:3—10.) But the "triumphing of these wicked men" shall be short; for "after three days and a half," prophetically computed, the witnesses shall rise again from the dead, to the great consternation of their insulting murderers. That is, the Lord will speedily raise up a competent number of witnesses, to stand up for his pure gospel; to the terror of its opposers, who hoped that it was finally extirpated. (Note, 20:4—6.) Nay, these witnesses will be called by "a voice from heaven, to ascend thither," which they will accordingly do, in the sight of their enemies. That is, the apparent extirpation of genuine Christianity in the western church, (the bounds of which are considered in their largest dimensions; for all true protestants are only "witnesses" for the truth, within the dominions of the beast,) will make way for more glorious times, when the ministers and professors of the gospel shall be far more zealous, honored, and prospered, than before; even as the ascension of Christ to glory was subsequent to his death and resurrection; and preparatory to the success of the gospel.—The outline of the above interpretation was given in the first edition of this work: and since that time, during twenty-four years, the author has had abundant opportunity of reconsidering his interpretation; and of comparing it with those of many other commentators, and with events which have occurred in Providence. He must, however, still avow his full conviction, that the transactions, predicted under the emblems of these verses, have not hitherto taken place.—It is generally agreed, that this chapter coincides in time with the ninth; (Notes, 9:) and that the state of the church, and of the nations in the western empire, is here predicted, as that of the eastern empire had before been. The whole testimony, therefore, against idolatry and popery, in the ten kingdoms, during “the twelve hundred and sixty years,” must be intended: and till that testimony is generally suppressed, the witnesses are not slain. The triumphs of the persecutors, in Germany, Bohemia, Spain, or Italy, did not amount to any thing, which can with the least propriety, be called “the slaying of the witnesses;” so long as a public testimony against papal corruptions, and for the true gospel, was borne in any other parts of the western empire.—However we explain the expression, “when they shall have finished their testimony,” we must make it agree with this part of the prediction; “they shall prophesy a thousand, two hundred, and sixty days, clothed in sackcloth.” Now, if the witnesses were slain at the council of Constance, or by the total ruin of the league at Smalcalde, or at any of the times, which different expositors fix upon; it inevitably follows, that they prophesied one, two, or three, “hundred days in sackcloth” less than the predicted period: except any will say, that they “prophesied in sackcloth,” after their resurrection and ascension into heaven.—The different opinions of eminently learned and able men on the subject, and the extreme difficulty which they all seem to find, in making one part of their interpretations consistent with the others, are powerful arguments in my mind, that they have not fact and truth to bear them out. The fulfilment of the prophecy seems to me indispensably to require the following particulars: 1st The general suppression of the public testimony for the truth, and against the grosser perversions of Christianity, in doctrine and worship throughout all the kingdoms of the western empire: but no such general suppression has taken place, especially in the latter ages of the period in question. 2dly. The open, avowed, and general triumph of enemies, however distinguished; as if the hated cause of true Christianity were finally ruined: but this has never yet been the case, throughout the ten kingdoms, however a part, and comparatively a small part, vainly exulted in some of them. 3dly. The very speedy and unexpected “revival of the witnesses; and the immediate, general, and extraordinary triumphs of the gospel, in all those countries, where it was supposed to be extirpated.—Whether this will be, as some with much probability think, the last persecution before the Millennium, the event must determine: but the war of the beast against the witnesses, is surely a widely different thing, from the war of Christ against the persecutors, which, I apprehend, is meant by the pouring out of the vials, at the opening of the seventh trumpet. (Notes, 16:) During the former, the enemy triumphs, and “the witnesses prophesy in sackcloth,” till slain: during the latter, the witnesses and their cause triumph, and their enemies are destroyed by tremendous judgments. Yet these distinct events have, by some respectable expositors, been apparently confounded. “The death and resurrection of “the witnesses, whatever events may be intended thereby, happen, as we learn from the concluding clause of the above passage, before the end of the second woe, and before the coming of the third woe.” Cunninghame. Had this writer, in company with many others, forgot the third verse, when he wrote this, and when he dates the slaying of the witnesses A. D. 1546? Were the 1260 days of “their prophesying in sackcloth,” terminated at that time? Or from what year does he date the beginning of the twelve hundred and sixty years? Certainly this calculation dates it from A. D. 286: earlier by several centuries, than the date hitherto by almost general consent, assigned to it: or by himself in other places. (Notes, 1,2. Dan. 7: 23—27. 8:13,14, 12:5—9.) Indeed it makes it precede the times of Constantine. (Note, 14:3—6.)—If the slaying of the witnesses be future; it is of vast importance that Christians should be aware of it, and act accordingly. It does not follow, from the suppression of the public testimony, viz. the general silencing of faithful ministers, and inhibiting the public administration of ordinances, in the purity and simplicity of Christian worship, through the ten kingdoms, that there will be no true Christianity in those kingdoms. Nay, it is not improbable, that the prevalence of true Christianity will provoke this persecution; that there will be thousands, and tens, nay hundreds of thousands, who secretly, at the hazard of their lives, will meet together, for the worship of God; that books, previously circulated, containing clear and practical religious instruction, will in a very great degree supply the want of public ordinances, during this short interruption; that the persecution itself, and the suppression of the testimony, will so show the odiousness of the persecutors, and the excellency of true Christians, as, by the divine blessing, exceedingly to multiply real believers, during the interdiction; and, in short, that the means previously used, nay, the seed which we are now sowing, may be abundantly prospered, in bringing forward the glorious times which shall succeed this event. The term of three years and a half, according to the prophetic calculation of the days, in which the testimony shall be suppressed; and the energy and success with which it shall then burst forth, from the ashes under which it had been smothered; and this, through all the ten kingdoms, appear to me to give an astonishing interest to this view of the subject; as well as most animating motives, now to sow to the utmost that seed, which will then produce the glorious harvest. In many other cases, we should “rejoice with trembling;” but in this, while we cannot but tremble, at the prospect before us; we should tremble with rejoicing. Like the believer’s death, it will be a dark and painful entrance on scenes inexpressibly delightful: and the approach of it, if perceived, will assure the intelligent Christian, that the final triumphs of the church are at hand, even at the door. In what way, the accomplishment will take place, the event must show; and it is in vain to argue against the improbability of it; for the dispensations of Providence commonly subvert all our preconceptions of probability. It should also be noted that this exceedingly depressed state of real Christianity seems only to relate to the western church exclusively. and probably in America, in Africa, in the East Indies, or other parts of Asia, there may be very flourishing churches at the same time.

14 The <sup>x</sup> second woe is past; and, behold, the third woe cometh quickly.

Note.—Immediately after the events, intended by the resurrection and “ascension of the witnesses,” some terrible judgment will befall a large part of the antichristian city, in which they were slain and lay unburied, especially some one of the ten kingdoms; which will destroy a great number of persons, and so alarm others, as to tend to their conversion, and to “the glory of God” in it.—The original expression, “seven thousand names of men,” (Note, Acts 1:15.) induces many to think, that this refers to the degradation and destruction of the most renowned and powerful supporters of the papal Antichrist: but the event alone can determine the precise meaning of this.—Thus the second woe, or the sixth trumpet will terminate; and behold, the third woe will speedily approach. Whether the revolutions and desolations in France and on the Continent, during the last twenty years, are specially meant, (as some expositors confidently decide,) our descendants will be more competent to determine, than we are. But if the whole, concerning the slaying of the witnesses, be yet unfulfilled, as I decidedly think, that cannot be.—Same hour. (13) The destruction implied in this verse must be coincident with the ascension of the witnesses, at the very same time, or when the prophecy is fulfilled.

thou shouldest give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, <sup>m</sup> and them that fear thy name, small and great; and <sup>n</sup> shouldest destroy them which <sup>o</sup> destroy the earth.

Note.—“The little book” has been shown to contain such extensive and important predictions, as abundantly to account for the solemnity with which it was delivered to the apostle. (Note, 10:2-4.) He therefore next proceeds with the subject which closed the ninth chapter. When “the seventh angel had sounded” his trumpet, there were great voices in heaven; all the blessed inhabitants rejoicing with admiring gratitude, because “the kingdoms of this world,” which had so long “lain under the wicked one,” were becoming willingly subject to JEROUAH, and to his anointed King, who would reign over them for ever; for his kingdom on earth would continue to the end of time, and in heaven to eternity. (Note, 19:1-6.) Then the emblematical representatives of the whole church were seen to prostrate themselves, in adoring worship; praising and rendering thanks to him, as the self-existent, omnipotent, and eternal Lord God; because he had “taken to him the power” over the nations, which was his by right at all times, and had now established his kingdom throughout the earth. (Notes, Ps. 2:7-12. 22:27-31. 72:8-11. Is. 9:6,7. Zech. 9:9,10. Matt. 6:13.)—If this be not addressed to Christ personally, (as some think,) it must be allowed to include him, as One with the Father and the Holy Spirit, in the Unity of the Godhead. (Note, 1:3,8-11.)—What follows is explained by some persons, to relate to the execution of the wrath of God on the nations before the Millennium, for their rage and enmity against his people whom they had slain; but who were figuratively “raised from the dead,” in the revival and final prevalence of the gospel, and rewarded in the exceeding prosperity of the church, whilst those who destroyed the earth, were exterminated: (Notes, 18: 19: 20:4-6.) but others suppose it to refer to the temporary opposition raised against the gospel after the Millennium, and just before the general resurrection, and the final judgment. (Notes, 20:7-10.) The account, however, in this place is very brief; for it will be explained and dilated on afterwards, in several chapters: and perhaps both events are compendiously hinted at. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, Dan. 2:34,35,44,45. 7:9-14,19-27.)—“Thus we are arrived at the consummation of all things, through a series of prophecies, extending from the apostle’s days to the ‘end of the world. This series has been the ‘clue to conduct us in our interpretation of these ‘prophecies: and though some of them may be ‘dark and obscure, considered in themselves;

Note.—This verse introduces a new subject, and should have been placed at the beginning of the next chapter. (Notes, 4:1—3. 15:5—8. 16:17—21. Is. 6:1—4.) The scene of the vision was laid at the temple, which was so far opened, that "the ark of the covenant" became visible: this denoted, that further discoveries were about to be made, relating to the interior parts of religion; for the preceding chapters chiefly referred to the affairs of the empire, and the external concerns of the church. "The lightnings, and voices, and thunderrings," were tokens of the special divine presence; and emblems of the terrible judgments, which were about to be revealed. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) The next chapter seems to go back to the primitive ages of the church: and we must pass a second time through many of the succeeding periods as before: though principally with relation to the times of the three last trumpets, called the woe-trumpets. (Note, 12:1,2.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The Lord measures his professed worshippers by the rule of his word, and weighs them in his balance. His ministers must also use the same standard; and they, who would be approved as inner court-worshippers, must try themselves by the same unerring touchstone. For mere nominal professors are accounted Gentiles before God; and "the holy city" has frequently been trodden under foot by such enemies of the Lord, in the habit of the worshippers!—Indeed, for many ages, a small number of "witnesses, prophesying in sackcloth;" have appeared on the part of Christ and the truth; whilst multitudes, in great splendor and power, have been ranked on the side of antichrist, in one form or another. But it is a most honorable employment to unite with these witnesses, however few, despised, or persecuted they may be; and to enter a public protest, connected with a holy and exemplary conduct, against the prevailing corruptions of the age and place in which we live. They who do this are "green olive-trees in the house of God," and "shining lights" in the dark places of the earth. (Notes, Ps. 52:8,9. Matt. 5:13—16. Phil. 2:14—18.) But we cannot obtain this honor, without courage, self-denial, and patience. Christians of this description are "harmless;" and they appear to be helpless and friendless: but it is safer to meet a roaring lion, or to face a battery of cannon, than to injure them; "for the Lord will plead their cause, and spoil the souls of those that spoil them;" (Note, Prov. 22:22, 23.) and their pious instructions, friendly warnings, and benevolent prayers, will be as fire to consume their inveterate enemies. Indeed the wrath of God, against the persecutors of his saints, will either stop the current of his bounty, or turn their comforts into curses, or bring the heaviest plagues on offending nations.

V. 7—12.

Neither Satan, nor any of his emissaries, can cut off the Lord's ministers, till they have "finished their testimony," and are ripe for glory. The cruelties and outrages of persecutors, on the living, or on the dead, as if they would carry their revenge into another world, cannot hinder the immediate felicity of their souls, the glorious resurrection of their bodies, or their final admission into heavenly mansions. But by such impious barbarities, "Christ is crucified afresh," and Jerusalem is turned into Sodom and Egypt: and the external homage paid to Christ by men of this character, (as the papists adore the crucifix,) seems even to crucify him again in effigy; after the example of those who builded the sepulchres of the prophets, and murdered the incarnate Son of God. (Note, Matt. 23:29—33.)—Determined rebels against the light rejoice, as on some most happy event, when they can silence, or drive to a distance, or destroy, the faithful servants of Christ, whose doctrine and conduct are a torment to them: but this joy is soon turned into terror and anguish; for the servants of God will rise again to be swift witnesses against them: then they will behold them ascending to the glory of the Lord, while more terrible vengeance awaits their enemies, than earthquakes, or death in its most terrific forms, can so much as shadow forth.

V. 13—19.

Many woes await the impenitent in this world; but the most dreadful woe will, as it were, cause all the rest to be forgotten; and it will arrive quickly. For the seventh angel shall sound; and the inhabitants of heaven will rejoice, because "the kingdoms of the earth shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever." At present, prayer for that blessed revolution in the state of the world, is the duty of all real Christians; but shortly they will be called to join in songs of loud thanksgiving and humble adoration, "to the Lord God almighty, who is, and was, and is to come." Oh may the name of our "heavenly Father be thus hallowed; may his kingdom thus come, and may his will be done in earth, as it is in heaven;" for his "is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen." (Notes, Matt. 6:9,10,13.)—The anger of the nations against his righteous authority will bring on the great day of his wrath: "the time of the dead, when they shall be judged," will soon come: then shall his faithful servants and friends, both great and small, be most munificently rewarded; and they who have destroyed the earth, shall be themselves destroyed. In the mean time, we, through the rended veil, may see the ark of the covenant, and our God upon a mercy-seat: and if we humbly approach him in this "new and living Way," the

The apostle sees in vision a travelling woman, watched by a red dragon, that he might devour her offspring; she is delivered of a son; he is caught up to the throne of God, and she flees into the wilderness, 1—5. Michael overcomes, and casts out Satan; joy in heaven on that occasion; and we denounced on the earth, through Satan's rage and malice, 7—12. The dragon persecutes the woman; she having wings given her flies into the wilderness, and is preserved from his unweated and varied efforts, 13—17.

AND a there appeared a great * wonder in heaven; b a woman c clothed with the sun, d and the moon under her feet, and upon her head e a crown of twelve stars:

2 And she, being with child, cried, f travelling in birth, and pained to be delivered.

Note.—The prophecies of this book (as it appears to me,) naturally divide themselves into two parts; the second of which begins with the last verse of the preceding chapter: though some begin it with the first verse of this chapter. So that we are here brought back to the primitive ages of the church; though they are far more briefly mentioned, than those are which followed. Inattention to this circumstance has occasioned much perplexity, in many attempts to explain these predictions: for if we do not keep hold of the clue, which has properly been called the internal geography and chronology of the book, imagination will rove at large; and supposed allusions to detached events, in different ages and places, will disjoint the interpretation, and render the whole ambiguous and suspicious.—The church, under the common emblem of "a woman," the mother of individual believers, deriving its original from "heaven," and being destined to return thither, was beheld, by the apostle in vision, in heaven; with such attire and circumstances as rendered the appearance peculiarly wonderful, or "a sign," being significant of some great events. She was "clothed with the sun;" as an emblem of her being justified, sanctified, and irradiated, by virtue of her union with Christ, "the Sun of righteousness;" she had "the moon under her feet;" to denote her superiority to the reflected and feebler light of the Mosaic dispensation, and to the love of all sublunary objects: her "crown of twelve stars," represented her honorable maintenance of the doctrine of the twelve apostles. Her pregnancy and travelling pains seem to be an emblem of the afflicted state of the church in the three first centuries; during which time, amidst many hardships and persecutions, with fervent prayers and earnest labors, she sought deliverance from her oppression, and an increase of her family, and waited the appointed term, which was to bring a happy crisis to these her sorrows. (Note, Hos. 2: 2—5. Gal. 4:17—20.)

Pained. (2) Βαγῶντι γεννήει. 9:5. 14:10. 20:10. Matt. 8:29. 2 Pet. 2:8. The word shows the extreme sufferings, or tortures, by which the faith and patience of the church were proved, previously to her deliverance, especially immediately before it.

3 And there appeared another † wonder in heaven; and behold s a great red dragon, having h seven heads and i ten horns, and k seven crowns upon his heads.

4 And l his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth: and m the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born.

5 And n she brought forth a man child, who was to o rule all nations with a rod of iron: and her child was p caught up unto God, and to his throne.

6 And q the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, r that they should feed her there s a thousand two hundred and threescore days.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—About the same time, another marvellous sight or "sign," was seen in heaven, even "a great red dragon."—"A dragon" was a known emblem of Satan, and of his principal agents or vicegerents on earth. (Note, 7—12.—Marg. Ref. g.) "Red," purple, or scarlet, was the distinguishing color of the Roman emperors, consuls, and generals; even as it has been since of the popes and cardinals. (Note, 17:3—5.) "The seven heads" of the dragon signify the seven hills on which Rome was built; and the seven forms of government which successively prevailed there. (Note, 17:9—14.) "The ten horns" marked out the ten kingdoms, into which the western empire was at length divided. (Notes, Dan. 2:31—49. 7:23—27.) But "the seven crowns on the dragon's heads," and not "ten crowns on his horns," showed, that the whole power was yet vested in the emperors and senate at Rome; and not, as afterwards, in the monarchs of the ten kingdoms. This circumstance, which many have not observed, precisely fixes the date of the prophecy, and undeniably proves, that it related to the pagan emperors, and not to the antichristian power afterwards mentioned. (Note, 13:1.) "The tail" of the dragon, "drawing a third part of the stars," represented the power of the Romans, which had cast down the princes of one third part of the earth, and reduced their countries to subjection. (Note, 8: 7.) This monster appeared to watch the woman, being prepared to devour her offspring; as Pharaoh destroyed the male children of Israel, or as Herod sought the life of Christ. (Notes, Ex. 1:15—22. Matt. 2:16—18.) Thus the Roman emperors and magistrates jealously watched the progress of Christianity from the first, and harassed the church with constant persecutions.—But, at length, the woman was delivered of a male child. During the time of the persecuting emperors the church was greatly increased; until one sprang from her, who ascended the imperial throne, being appointed to be the vicegerent of Christ, in ruling the nations, and crushing the enemies of the gospel, “as with a rod of iron.” (Notes, 2:24—28. 6:12—17. Ps. 2:7—9.) Thus the offspring of the church, even Christians in general; and Constantine, with the Christian emperors, who succeeded him in particular, escaped the rage of the red dragon; and the latter was exalted to very great honor and authority, under the immediate protection, and by the special favor of God.—New trials, however, awaited the woman, which at length drove her into the wilderness, or rendered her desolate and distressed. For the termination of Pagan persecution made way for those events, which at length terminated in the antichristian power, the continuance of which was fixed to one thousand two hundred and sixty years. (Notes, 11:1—14. 2 Thes. 2:5—7.) But God had provided a place where he would sustain the church when the time arrived: and her flight into the wilderness is here mentioned by way of anticipation.—This interpretation has been objected to, because the sixth verse is supposed to be introduced by anticipation: but, in fact, it is manifest, that the apostle thus introduces it; else, why does he resume it, with some additional circumstances, after several verses predicting most important events? (14.) Yet even then, the church is represented only as prepared to fly, not as yet actually fled.—The author has before shown his decided opinion, and stated his reasons for it, that “the little book” contained no more than part of the eleventh chapter: that the slaying of the witnesses is yet future; and that the concluding part of the preceding chapter, to the end of the eighteenth verse, brings the series of predicted events to the Millennium, and indeed to the end of the world. (Notes, 10: 11.) If then, this and the following chapters relate, as undoubtedly they do, to events preceding the Millennium; the sacred writer must in some place go back, and resume his subject: and no part can be selected, in which this can so naturally be fixed, as the last verse of the preceding chapter, which introduces the beginning of this.—“We would also divide the Revelation into two parts; or rather the book so divides itself. For the former part proceeds, as we have seen, in a regular and successive series, from the apostle’s days to the consummation of all things. “Nothing can be added, but it must fall somewhere or other within the compass of this period; it must be a resumption of the same subjects; and this latter part may most properly be considered as an enlargement and illustration of the former. Several things, which before were only touched upon, required to be more copiously handled, and placed in a stronger light. It was said that “the beast should make war against the witnesses, and overcome them:” but who or what the beast is, we may reasonably conjecture; but the apostle himself will more surely explain. The transactions of the seventh trumpet are all summed up and compressed in a few verses; but we shall see the particulars branched out and enlarged on into as many chapters. In short, this latter part is designed, as a supplement to the former, to complete what was deficient, to explain what was dubious, to illustrate what was obscure: and as the former described more the destinies of the Roman empire, so this latter relates to the fates of the Christian church.’ Bp. Newton.—Nothing more fully confirms my opinion, that Bishop Newton’s outline is the true interpretation, than the dissatisfaction which permanently rests on my mind, after carefully considering those expositions, which have been substituted in the place of it. While objections are stated, I hesitate, not at once perceiving how they can be answered; but when the interpretation, substituted in its place, has excited my attention, still more insuperable objections crowd on my mind.—‘The man child is the mystic word of God, which is described as the Son of the church, because it is the incorruptible seed, from which all true believers are born.’ Faber. The ‘mystic word,’ according to this statement, is in fact the parent, not the son, of the church: but waving this, if the respectable writer here cited could not make out his system, without having recourse to so indefinite and allegorical an interpretation, of an event evidently most important in the prophecy; I cannot but conclude, that his plan of interpretation is, in this respect erroneous: and I must give that of Bishop Newton the decided preference. Most certainly, the subversion of the Pagan persecuting Roman empire, and that of the immense ancient system of idolatry, as supported by all the genius, influence, and power of Greece and Rome, was no inconsiderable event, in the prophetic history of the Christian church: and had it not been specially and prominently marked, it might have been thought an extraordinary omission. (Note, 6: 11—14.) Whatever the character of Constantine or that of his successors, was, the revolution was wonderful, and indeed one of the most extraordinary recorded in universal history. (Note, Zech. 8:20—23.) The whole pagan system was cast down from its “heaven;” its authority and persecuting domination; and the ruler or rulers of the nations professed Christianity, and protected the church. Subsequent corruptions, terminating in still more dire and destructive persecutions, indeed followed, and are particularly foretold: but surely, it is natural to suppose, that the prophet, if indeed he resumed his subject, to give a more particular account of the periods which he had compendiously mentioned, should go back to the first ages, and in few words mark the deliverance of the church from pagan persecution, and the revolution in the empire from pagan to Christian. I by no means think, with Bishop Newton, that Galerius, or any personal enemy to Constantine, is meant by the red or fiery dragon; but the whole pagan authority and influence, instigated by the devil, (as the papal power and influence afterwards was,) and seeking the destruction of Christianity, and of the Christian rulers and princes who supported it. So that we may understand, as literally as we choose, the language concerning “the old dragon;” only remembering that he “works in” and by “the children of disobedience.” (Notes, Eph. 2:1,2. 1 John 4:4—6. 5:19.)—Christians are s~~h~~own of as exercising the authority of Christ, and ruling the nations with a rod of iron: (2:27.) it can therefore be no objection, that the same allusion is made, in respect of the first Christian emperors, under whom the most entire revolution, from persecuting idolatry in full domination, to the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the Roman empire, took place.—Some commentators, indeed, would interpret this man child to be Christ himself; but this cannot be meant, for he was born of the church of Israel, not of the Christian church; nor is he ever spoken of as “the Son of the church;” but rather as the Husband, or even Father of it. (Notes, Ps. 22:30,31. Is. 9:6,7. 53:9,10. 54:4,5. 59:20,21. John 3:27—36.) The apostle also speaks as a prophet, not as a historian; therefore events, future to him, must exclusively be intended.

Note.—The events, here foretold, preceded and made way for the flight of the church into the wilderness; (Note, 13—17.) and therefore cannot possibly mean the reformation which took place many ages after that event. The strenuous and combined efforts of the Pagans against the establishment of Christianity, and the destruction of their idolatrous worship, was, as I apprehend, represented by “the dragon and his angels” warring in heaven against “Michael and his angels;” perhaps with some reference to the expulsion of Satan and his adherents from heaven, on their original apostacy. (Notes, Luke 10:17—20. John 12:27—33. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.) Michael may represent Christ; (Marg. Ref. u;) and “the devil, and Satan,” the old slanderer, adversary, and murderer of mankind, was the invisible commander of the opposite army. The former employed as his instruments Christian magistrates, faithful ministers, and believers, as well as holy angels: the latter fought by persecuting emperors, such as Julian the apostate, idolatrous priests, and heathen philosophers. (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) The conflict was long and sharp: but it ended in the total defeat of Satan’s army, in the deposing of idolaters from all rule and authority, and in their reduction to the most abject condition. This was represented by the devil being cast out of heaven: for, by the power of idolatrous emperors and magistrates, he had maintained that false religion, by which he had deceived all the world, and seduced them to be his subjects and worshippers; but, by the subversion of that authority, and the subsequent demolition of idolatry, he was cast down from his dignity, as “god and prince of this world,” for a time, and in a measure. When the Pagan emperors were dethroned, Satan’s angels were cast out with him: for both the instruments and ministers of idolatry were laid aside, and even their very idols were destroyed with contempt and execration.—It is remarkable, that Constantine himself, and others of his time, describe these events under the same image of the dethroning of the dragon. ‘More-over, a picture of Constantine was set up over the palace-gate, with a cross over his head, and under his feet the great enemy of mankind, (who persecuted the church by means of impious tyrants,) in the form of a dragon, transfixed with a dart through the midst of its body, and falling headlong into the depth of the sea.’ Bp. Newton. This shows how Christians then understood the prophecy; and no doubt they rightly interpreted it.—Upon this great victory, the apostle heard songs of praise in heaven; because “salvation and strength were come,” the church was delivered from persecution, and its friends advanced to authority; the kingdom of God was openly established, and the power of his anointed Son most gloriously displayed. (Note, 19:1—6.) "For," say they, "the accuser of our brethren is cast out of his dominion," and deprived of his influence: he could no longer lay grievous crimes to the charge of the Christians, for which to put them to death; as Satan had accused Job before God himself, and was ready to accuse others continually, night and day. (Notes, Job 1:9—11. 2:4,5. Zech. 3:1—4.) But this victory was not ascribed to the sword of war, which was only a subordinate means, when matters were brought to a crisis: for it was acquired through the merit and efficacy of the atoning sacrifice of Christ, by faith in his blood, and a bold and holy profession of his gospel; together with "the word of their testimony," even that of those who went forth every where preaching the doctrine of salvation; and "who loved not their lives unto the death," but readily sealed their testimony with blood, when called to it. These were the warriors and the weapons, by which Christianity undermined and subverted the power of the idolatrous empire, and acquired an entire ascendancy over their Pagan enemies: and if Christians had continued to fight with these weapons, and such as these, their victories would have been more numerous and glorious, and the effects of them more durable. The "heavens were, therefore, called upon to rejoice, with all the inhabitants of them," or all who were on the Lord's side in this contest. But at the same time a woe was denounced upon the inhabitants of the earth and the sea, or the nations in general; because the devil, and his dethroned agents, would not rest in their disgraced condition: though idolatry was suppressed, it was not destroyed, and its partisans would surely excite fresh commotions. Nay, the devil would be the more furious in his opposition to the gospel, to the ruin of numbers of souls, and to the great distraction of the empire; as he would know that "his time was short," that Pagan idolatry would soon be totally crushed, and that "the Seed of the woman would at length bruise his head:" he would, therefore, take his opportunity of doing all possible mischief to mankind, whilst he had it in his power.—His angels, &c. (9) Note, Matt. 25:41—46.—A short time. (12) This is made an objection to interpreting the prophecy of the ruin of Pagan idolatry: but any limited time is short, compared with the eternal doom awaiting the great enemy of the church and all its coadjutors.—They who interpret it of the Reformation, strangely forget, that the dragon had at the time of his being cast out, "the crowns on his seven heads," and not on his ten horns: (Notes, 3—6. 13:1.) and that this event preceded the 1260 years of the church's abode in the wilderness.

That old serpent, called the devil. (9) Ὁ οφεις ὁ αρχαιος, ὁ κλιμενος διabolος. 20:2. 2 Cor. 11:3. A learned commentator has lately endeavored to prove that the animal, by which the devil deceived Eve, was an ape, or some animal of the ape species.—It is however evident, that the Hebrew word, used Gen. 3:1. never means an ape, in the Old Testament.

The Arabic word, adduced, is indeed one name of the devil; and some words from the same root signify an ape; but they also signify a lion, a wild cow, or any animal with a peculiar kind of nose. (Richardson's Arabic, Persian, and English Dictionary.)—Waving this, however, are we to suppose, that the inspired writers of the New Testament, kept up, by express words, when not quoting from the Septuagint, the false opinion, derived from that version, that Satan deceived Eve, as concealed in a serpent, when in fact he was concealed in an ape? Is this our reverence for the words of the living God!—Now. (10) Apoc. Matt. 3:15. 26:29. Hitherto. "Hitherto the Lord has helped us." (Note, 1 Sam. 7:12.)—The church and all her friends might praise God, very properly, for deliverance from Pagan persecution, though other trials still awaited her.

13 And when the dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth, <sup>x</sup> he persecuted the woman which brought forth the man child.

14 And <sup>y</sup> to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, <sup>z</sup> that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for <sup>a</sup> a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent.

15 And the serpent <sup>b</sup> cast out of his mouth water as a flood after the woman, that he might cause her to be carried away of the flood.

17 And <sup>d</sup> the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went <sup>e</sup> to make war with the remnant of her seed, <sup>f</sup> which keep the commandments of God, <sup>g</sup> and have the testimony of Jesus Christ.

Note.—While the idolatrous party, who were the agents of the devil, were constrained to submit to the power of Christian rulers; they still persisted in their persecuting enmity to the church, and tried various methods of re-establishing their ancient worship. Several attempts were made of this kind, during the reign of Constantine. Julian, afterwards the apostate, left no method untried, by which he could hope to effect it. He endeavored to hinder the liberal education of the Christians, that their ignorance might expose them to contempt, and render them incapable of defending or propagating their religion: he employed writers, of great learning and ingenuity, to ridicule, revile, and reason against Christianity: he excited Arian princes to persecute their orthodox subjects; and in many other ways he attempted to undermine the cause of Christ. At the same time, the devil and his agents, prevailed to corrupt the church with manifold heresies, to deform it with various scandals, and to rend it in pieces with fierce contentions; and these evils grew worse and worse, during the period of the first four trumpets. (Notes, 8:) Thus the way was preparing for the erection of another idolatrous persecuting power, which will be shortly considered. In the mean time, "two wings, as of a great eagle, were given to the woman;" that she might be ready to fly to her place in the wilderness, when the time came. (Note, Ex. 19:4.) These are supposed by some writers to refer to the eastern and western empires, the standard of which was an eagle, and the protection afforded by them was the means of preservation to the church, till the prefixed time of her obscurity arrived. In the midst of the preceding convulsions and heresies, the church was, as it were, preparing to flee away to her retreat, from the fury of her opposers; where she was at length to be nourished, "for a time, and times, and half a time;" or, for three years and a half, forty-two months, or one thousand two hundred and sixty days: but her flight was not completed, till the establishment of the antichristian power spoken of in the next chapter. (Notes, 13:1.) Her continuance in the wilderness, therefore, exactly accords to the time during which the "two witnesses prophesied in sackcloth:" both relate to the same events, and both began and must end together. (Note, 11:3—6.) If the beginning of this term of time be fixed, A. D. 606, it will terminate A. D. 1866: and whoever dates "the slaying of the witnesses" earlier than that time, removes proportionably backward the commencement of this term. (Note, 3—6.) If this event took place in 1546, as Mr. Faber and Mr. Cunningham suppose; then, beyond all controversy, the 1260 years began about A. D. 286: yet Mr. Cunningham afterwards dates them A. D. 533. I do not presume to say, when it began; but consistency is essentially requisite in our interpretations. (Note, 11:1,2.)—To prevent the escape of the woman, "the dragon cast out of his mouth a flood of water," to carry her away. This is explained by many expositors, with great propriety, of the inundation of the Huns, Goths, Vandals, and other barbarous nations, by which the western empire was overwhelmed: (Notes, 8:) for it is known, that the strenuous adherents to paganism encouraged these irruptions, in hopes of subverting Christianity by their means; and no doubt Satan expected to overwhelm the church, when idolaters overturned the empire. But the event proved entirely contrary to all their expectations. "The earth helped the woman, and swallowed up the flood:" the victorious barbarians united themselves to the vanquished Romans, and formed one people with them, in the several provinces of the empire; they even embraced, in form at least, the Christian religion. Ungodly men of various descriptions, from regard to their secular interests, protected the church amidst these convulsions: and the subversion and dismembering of the western empire did not at all help the cause of Idolatry; nay, it tended to the propagation of Christianity!—But the dragon, being disappointed in this attempt, was the more enraged, and took another method of making war against true Christians, as "the seed of the church." (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) These were but "a remnant:" for superstitions and heresies of various kinds, and corruptions, had long before this increased exceedingly, which afforded the enemy his opportunity for the assault and success predicted in the next chapter.—If the plan of interpretation, before laid down, be well grounded, these verses must, as has been stated, predict the events which made way for the establishment of the persecuting domination of nominal Christians; the flight of the church into the wilderness; and the prophesying of the witnesses in sackcloth, during one thousand two hundred and sixty days. The particulars of these latter events are predicted in the two following chapters; with several things relating to the approach and earnestness of the church's delivery, and the destruction of her grand enemy. In the fifteenth chapter there is a solemn pause, as introductory to the subsequent events; and then the prediction proceeds in regular order, to the Millennium, the day of judgment, and the heavenly world. Thus, from the beginning of this chapter, where the prophet resumes his subject, a series of events, succeeding to each other, is predicted; and every part casts light on all that which precedes or follows. But if the predictions of these verses be referred to any part of the twelve hundred and sixty years, or to the end of them; this order is, as it appears to me, without necessity, and without proof, disturbed and deranged; and indeed an entirely new interpretation of all the subsequent chapters, showing that they relate to future events, seems indispensably necessary to preserve the consistency of the interpretation.—As I am fully persuaded, that the transactions predicted in the two next chapters (the concluding part of the fourteenth alone excepted,) are already fulfilled: I must adhere to the outlines of Bishop Newton's interpretation, in preference to later systems.

That he might cause her to be carried away of the flood. (15) ἵνα ταυτην ποιμισοροητον ποιιση. (Notes, 2 Sam. 22:5,6. Ps. 65:6,7. 93:3,4.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

True Christians, being of heavenly birth, and expecting a heavenly felicity, have "put on Christ," are "clothed in his righteousness," irradiated by his light, beautified by his image, and taught to put earthly things beneath their feet; and they deem it their honor to profess, adorn, and recommend the doctrine of the holy apostles. All who are thus minded should pray fervently, and labor diligently, in their several places, for the increase, prosperity, and purity of the church: and ministers should especially abound in these holy employments. For the devil and his instruments are vigilant, united, bold, and unwearied, in their efforts to destroy the religion of Christ; and too generally the "kingdoms of the world" have been seduced into their service: surely then, the servants of God ought not to be timid, heartless, or negligent, in opposing their designs!—It is a striking proof of the wretched state of this apostate world, that so large a proportion of its inhabitants have generally been subjected to men, eminent only for tyranny and cruelty: and it is a great mystery in Providence, that these are left to attempt and effect so many things against his church. They cannot, however, prevent the conversion of sinners, or the final salvation of believers: nor can they withstand him, who is exalted to "the throne of God, to rule over all nations with a rod of iron;" or overcome those, who are invested with authority and armed with power by him, for the benefit of his church, and to crush those who persecute it. (Notes, Zeck. 4:4—10. 12:2—5.) The Lord has not hitherto indeed generally wrought by the arm of the magistrate; but when he is pleased to raise up rulers to protect his people, and by scriptural means to promote his cause, we should be thankful for them, and avail ourselves of their countenance and assistance: though the church has her place prepared, and her sustenance given her, far more frequently in a wilderness, than in an imperial palace.

V. 7—17.

Whilst "Michael our Prince," "his angels," and his servants, fight against "the dragon and his angels;" we need not fear the final prevalence of any enemy, either against the church, or any true believer. The "great dragon, even the old serpent called the devil, and Satan," while he deceives and rules over all the rest of the world, will as surely be prevented from hurting the true church, as he and his angels were cast out of heaven at first. For "salvation and strength, the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ," will renewedly come, from time to time, till the dominion of every enemy be destroyed, and the mouth of every "accuser of the brethren" be stopped. (Notes, Is. 54:15—17. Rom. 8:32—39.) But victory in this holy war can be obtained only "by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of the testimony" of his servants. Faith, prayer, a holy life, patient continuance in well-doing, and a willingness to venture or suffer even unto death, with zealous and faithful preaching, are the weapons by which the saints have always conquered; and we must go forth with the same armor, and fight in the same manner, if we would share their triumphs. (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) Over such victories all heaven rejoices, and all that love the kingdom of Christ. —But Satan and his agents, however degraded and baffled, will proceed to bring "woe unto the inhabitants of the earth:" nay, they rage the more, when their plots are defeated; and multitudes are by them deceived and destroyed. Yet the church still maintains its ground on earth, and believers continually enter heaven: when dangers seem to overtake them, they are furnished with "eagles' wings," to "fly away and be at rest:" when heresies, infidelity, or tribulation, appear ready to overwhelm them, the earth opens and swallows up the flood. Even worldly men give assistance to the church, when the Lord is pleased to make use of them; and she will be preserved for ever, with all the remnant of her seed, "who keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ."

CHAP. XIII.

A vision of "a beast rising out of the sea;" with an account of its power, rage, and success, 1—10: of a "second beast, rising out of the earth," exercising the power of the former beast, making an image of it, and compelling all to worship it, 11—17. The number of the beast, 18.

Note.—The apostle, "standing on the" shore, saw a savage "beast rise out of the sea;" that is, a tyrannical, idolatrous, and persecuting power, springing up out of the commotions which took place in the world. All interpreters agree, that the Roman empire, in one form or other, was here intended: and Papists, continuing such, must contend, though against the most conclusive evidence which can be imagined, that Pagan Rome was meant. But Rome Pagan had existed many hundred years when the apostle had this vision; and yet he saw "the rise of this beast."—It may indeed be said that Daniel, in vision, saw the rise of the Babylonian empire, though the rise of it preceded his prophecy; (Notes, Dan. 7:1—3.) so that, this circumstance alone may not be altogether conclusive in the argument: but the reign of this beast, during twelve hundred and sixty years, from whatever period it be dated, must be conclusive: for the Pagan Roman empire, properly speaking, did not continue three hundred years, from the time when this prophecy was delivered; and the very last remains of it were subverted in about four hundred years. Indeed, the whole time, from the building of Rome, to the time of Constantine, the first Christian emperor, was considerably less than eleven hundred years; and even to Augustulus, the last emperor, A. D. 476; that is, from its birth to its death; it lasted at the most only twelve hundred and twenty-eight years; and for the first five or six hundred years of this term, the Romans had not the smallest concern in any thing, which respected the church of God. It is therefore absolutely certain, that the Roman power, as professing Christianity, and not that of Pagan Rome, is meant. The dragon before mentioned had "seven crowns on his heads," but this "beast has ten crowns on his horns." (Note, 12:3—6.) This plainly showed, that a revolution would take place before the time predicted should arrive; and that the dominion would be removed from the imperial city, and divided among ten kingdoms. —The seven heads had indeed lost their crowns, but they had preserved, or acquired, a name, or names, "of blasphemy." (Notes, Dan. 2:40—43. 7:6—8, 19—27. 8:9—12.) Imperial Rome was often called The eternal city, and The goddess of the earth, with other blasphemous titles; and altars, temples, and sacrifices were assigned to her, as a deity; and it will appear in the sequel, how antichristian Rome, after the loss of the imperial dignity, obtained or resumed similar names of blasphemy. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:3, 4.)—Out of the sea.] 11:7. Notes, 17:7, 8. Dan. 7:2, 3.

Note.—This beast was without a name, like the fourth in Daniel's prophecy; (Note, Dan. 7:7,8.) but it resembled in divers respects the other three beasts, which that prophet had seen; and thus united the fierceness, cruelty, and terror of all the rest. (Notes, Dan. 7:4—6.) It was indeed the same with Daniel's fourth beast; the same empire, but in one special form: for "the dragon had now given his power, throne, and great authority," to the beast. The dragon may here mean, either the devil, or the devil's vicegerent, the idolatrous Roman empire. (Notes, 12:3—12.) So that when another idolatrous persecuting power had succeeded to that of the heathen emperors; then "the dragon" had transferred his dominion to "the beast," or the devil had appointed another vicegerent: and all the world knows, that this accords to the history of the Roman empire, Pagan and Papal.—The project of re-establishing the old idolatry having failed; a new species was invented: saints and angels succeeded to gods and demi-gods; and persecution was the means employed for supporting it. (Note, 12:13—17.) "The head of the beast, wounded to death," represented the entire subversion of the imperial authority in the time of Augustulus, or when Rome became a dukedom to the Exarchate of Ravenna. (Note, 8:12.) Five of the heads of the beast, or the dragon, (for in this respect they are the same,) were superseded, before the apostle's time, namely, kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, and military tribunes, but at the time above mentioned, the sixth received a deadly wound. (Note, 17:9—14.) It was, however, afterwards healed, by the revival of the imperial name and dignity, in the person of Charlemagne, or Charles the Great, who was proclaimed Augustus, A. D. 800: and this head subsisted ever since in the emperors of Germany, or of "the holy Roman empire," till subverted by recent revolutions. For the emperor of Austria, doubtless by constraint, has resigned the title; and the present ruler of France (1813) has usurped it for a season. But many things seem now (1815) to be reverting into their former channel; and it is too early to judge how this revolution may terminate. After Charles had been thus proclaimed emperor, the temporal and ecclesiastical rulers mutually strengthening each other, the Roman power became again formidable, and "all the world," or all the earth, was astonished to behold that empire revived, which seemed to be totally extinct: so that a superstitious and idolatrous obedience was rendered to this temporal authority, as engaged to support the ecclesiastical tyranny of the Romish church. Thus they virtually "worshipped the dragon, who gave his power to the beast;" by submitting, without reserve, to the same idolatrous persecuting power as before, only in another form: and they "worshipped the beast" as one, who never had his equal on earth, or in heaven, and who would surely crush all that presumed to oppose him. Thus the old idolatry was fully re-established, with new names; and the worship of idols, or creatures, is in effect worshipping the devil.—Some explain "the deadly wound," inflicted on one head of the beast, to mean the revolution which took place, when Christian emperors succeeded the Pagan persecuting emperors; and the healing of this deadly wound, the subsequent establishment of another idolatrous persecuting power, bearing the Christian name. The two interpretations agree in the grand outline; and the nature of this work precludes the particular consideration of subordinate questions.—Who is like, &c. (4) Notes, Ex. 15:11. Ps. 89:6—12. Is. 40:25, 26. 2 Thes. 2:3,4.

5 And there was given unto him <sup>a</sup> a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; <sup>b</sup> and power was given unto him † to continue forty and two months.

6 And <sup>u</sup> he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name, <sup>x</sup> and his tabernacle, <sup>y</sup> and them that dwell in heaven.

7 And it was given unto him <sup>z</sup> to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: <sup>a</sup> and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations.

Note.—To this monstrous savage beast "was given a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies."—It will soon be stated as the author's opinion, that the ecclesiastical power of Rome was the agent, and the Pope the speaking image of this beast: (Notes, 11—17.) and every one knows what blasphemous and enormous claims of 'His Holiness,' 'Infallibility,' 'Sovereign of kings and kingdoms,' 'Christ's vicegerent on earth,' yea, 'God upon earth,' have been spoken by this mouth of the beast. Power also, or authority, even the secular empire, was given him to continue, or rather to practise, or to prosper in his undertakings, for forty-two months, or twelve hundred and sixty years. Some copies read, "Make war" (7): and no doubt that is included. This term coincides exactly with that during which "the two witnesses prophesied in sackcloth." (Notes, 11:3—12.) This beast would, during this period, "open his mouth in blasphemies against God;" combining with the ecclesiastical power in its usurpations, and in entrenching upon the peculiar honors and prerogatives of God himself. "He would blaspheme the name of God," by requiring all men, at the instigation of the ecclesiastical power, to render that worship to creatures, which belongs to God alone; "and his tabernacle," or true Christians, by stigmatizing, anathematizing, and murdering them, as heretics; "and them that dwell in heaven," by scandalizing angels and departed saints, as if they sacrilegiously sought and were pleased with the idolatrous worship rendered to them; and by ascribing to the saints a variety of ridiculous actions, which they never did. (Note, 18:20.) It was also "given to the beast to wage war against the saints, and to overcome them;" and no computation can reach the numbers who have been put to death, in different ways, on account of their maintaining the profession of the gospel, and opposing the corruptions of the church of Rome. A million of the poor Waldenses perished in France; nine hundred thousand orthodox Christians were slain, in less than thirty years after the institution of the Jesuits; the duke of Alva boasted of having put thirty-six thousand to death in the Netherlands, by the hands of the common executioner, during the space of a few years. The Inquisition destroyed by various tortures one hundred and fifty thousand Christians, within thirty years. These are a few specimens, and but a few, of those which history has recorded: but the total amount will never be known, till "the earth shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." (Note, Is. 26:20,21.) These were put to death by the secular arm; by that power, of which the empire was the head, and which subsisted in ten kingdoms: for the persecuting ecclesiastical power, condescended to employ kings and emperors, as the executioners of its murderous decrees!—Mr. Faber has here very justly pointed out an inaccuracy in bishop Newton, who seems to confound this beast, or the secular empire, in all the ten kingdoms, with the little horn predicted by Daniel, which accords to the second beast, afterwards mentioned. (Note, 11,12.) Yet, as the secular power executed the persecuting decrees of the ecclesiastical, and gave its power to that beast; the things, stated by bishop Newton as accomplishments of this prophecy, were evidently such; though he has not, with his usual accuracy, marked the manner in which this took place. (Notes, Dan. 7:7,8,23—27. 11:36.)

Note.—By the means above mentioned, the beast maintained his dominion over the inhabitants of the western world, and indeed in many other places; and all worshipped him, by the most abject submission of body, soul, and conscience, except "the remnant according to the election of grace," (Note, Rom. 11:1—6.) "whose names were written in the book of life," belonging to "the Lamb that had been slain, from the foundation of the world."—It is not indeed quite clear, whether Christ be here said to "have been slain from the foundation of the world;" that is, in the purpose of God, and the efficacy of his blood to the salvation of all believers; or whether the names of the persons spoken of were "written in the book of life, from the foundation of the world," as the elect of God: but the language is in a parallel text more explicit. (17:8.—Notes, 20:11—15. 21:22—27. 1 Pet. 1:17—21.)—This prophecy was of that importance, to the encouragement and direction of believers, during 'the reign of the 'beast,' as well as for the due understanding of the greatest part of this book, that the attention of every one was especially called to it. (Notes, 2:10,11. Matt. 13:9.—Marg. Ref. f.) For the persecutors would assuredly be destroyed, in the same manner as they had destroyed others: (Notes, 17:—19:) yet here would be the trial of "the faith and patience of the saints;" to bear up under such complicated dangers and sufferings, and of so long continuance, beyond the example of all former times; and to persevere in faith and obedience through them.—Faith and patience would be more wanted by the saints, and have more to try and exercise them, and for a longer time than in any other persecution whatever.

12 And <sup>n</sup> he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, <sup>o</sup> and causeth the earth, and them which dwell therein, to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed.

Note.—The second "beast" did not come up out of the sea, or from wars and tumults, as the first did; (Note, 1.) but "out of the earth," silently and gradually, as plants spring up; (Note, 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) and it "had horns like unto a lamb;" denoting, that it was a spiritual dominion, professedly derived from Christ, and exercised in a gentle manner. It was, therefore, the emblem of the Roman hierarchy; and his two horns have, very probably, been supposed to signify the regular and secular clergy of that church: as the other "beast" was the emblem of the temporal authority exercised in the ten kingdoms of the empire, in support of that spiritual tyranny. The second beast is elsewhere called "the false prophet;" (16:13. 19:20.) which abundantly confirms this interpretation. 'In the language of symbols, horns are kingdoms; consequently the horns of an 'ecclesiastical beast must be ecclesiastical kingdoms. Now I know not what idea we can

'annex to an ecclesiastical kingdom, subservient to the head of an ecclesiastical empire, except that of a regularly organized body of ecclesiastics, subject primarily to their own immediate superior, and ultimately to the head of the whole empire.' Faber. Thus the regular clergy, or the different orders of monks, are subject each to the principal of his order, who himself is subject to the church and bishop of Rome: and, in like manner, the secular clergy, or parochial ministers and others connected with them, are subject primarily to their ordinary, or diocesan bishop; he, to the archbishop, primate, metropolitan, or patriarch; but all to the church and bishop of Rome. And as they are enjoined celibacy, this subjection, and their devotedness to the common cause of that church, are most entire and efficacious.— But though the beast "had two horns, like a lamb," yet "he spake as a dragon," or with all the tyranny and cruelty of the persecuting Roman emperors. (Note, 12:3—6.) And the high claims of authority, and the peremptory commands, menaces, and decisions of the Roman hierarchy, are well known. The second "beast" is likewise the minister, adviser, or agent, of the first beast, and "exerciseth all his power before him." Accordingly the different orders of monks, as well as the secular clergy of Rome, have always possessed immense influence in the affairs of the kings and nations, belonging to that communion: their principal ministers of state have generally been cardinals, or other ecclesiastics: the magistrate has been engaged to use his sword to enforce their decrees, or execute their sentences against heretics; and bloody wars without number have been waged in support of their antichristian domination. In return for these services, they "cause the earth to worship the first beast;" they have always been the enemies of civil liberty, and the supporters of tyranny, and even of the unlawful and most iniquitous commands of those princes who supported their authority; which is a kind of idolatry, as it exalts the will of man above that of God. So that tyranny upholds them, and they uphold tyranny; they enslave men's consciences, and help kings to enslave their persons; and in both respects enforce idolatry. The ecclesiastical power 'is the common centre and cement, which unites all the distinct kingdoms of the Roman empire; and by joining with them, procures them a blind obedience from their subjects; and so it is the occasion of the preservation of the old Roman empire, in some kind of unity, and name, and strength.' Whiston.—Implicit obedience, however, to the authority of the beast, as supporting idolatry, and requiring men to worship creatures and images, under heavy penalties, must be especially meant.—'Here we have a plain prediction of some spiritual power, ... which should arrogate to itself universal or catholic authority in religious matters; which should co-exist upon the most friendly terms with the ten horned temporal empire, instigating it to persecute during the space of forty-two prophetic months, ... all such as should dare to dispute its usurped domination, and which in short should solve the symbolical problem of two contemporary beasts, by exhibiting to the world the singular spectacle of a complete empire within an empire. Where we are to look for this power, since the great Roman beast was divided into ten horns, ... let the impartial voice of history determine. ... Daniel who fully delineates the character of the little horn, is entirely silent respecting the two horned beast. John, who as fully delineates the character of the two horned beast, is entirely silent respecting the little horn.—The little horn and the two horned beast, act precisely in the same capacity: each exercising the power of the first beast before him; and each perishing in one common destruction with him.' Faber. (Notes, Dan. 7:7—14, 19—27. 8:9—12.)

13 And he doeth great wonders, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men,

14 And he deceiveth them that dwell on the earth, by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast; saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast, which had the wound by a sword, and did live.

15 And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed.

16 And he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads:

17 And that no man might buy or sell, save that he had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name.

Note.—The second beast maintains his power by "doing great wonders." (Note, 2 *The*s. 2:8—12.) These, whether they be human impostures, or wrought by the agency of Satan, "he doeth in the sight of men to deceive them," and "in the sight of the first beast" to serve him; but they are not performed either by the power, or for the glory of God. (Notes, Ex. 7:22, 23. 8:7, 8. Deut. 13:1—5. Matt. 24:23—25. 2 Tim. 3:6—9.) The fire may allude to the miracles wrought by Elijah; (Notes, 1 Kings 18:36—39. 2 Kings 1:9—12. Luke 9:51—56.) and predict the vain pretences of the beast to miracles of that kind. But some interpret it thus: 'Heaven is a symbol of the church, and the earth, of the Roman empire. The darting forth of fire out of the church

‘upon the secular empire, must mean solemn interdicts and excommunications, pronounced against those who dared to oppose the authority of the beast.’ Faber. The miracles, however, of which the advocates for popery boast, as certain marks of a true church, are here shown to be the distinguishing stigma of antichrist: that is, such ambiguous and suspicious miracles; or indeed any miracles, if wrought in support of idolatry, in opposition to the doctrines of scripture, and to justify the persecuting cruelty of those who profess them. By these means “the two horned beast,” or the regular and secular clergy, deceived the inhabitants of the earth, and induced them to make “an image of the beast,” or the temporal authority of the empire, as it formerly subsisted in the reigning emperor at Rome. This image has been variously interpreted. But is not the pope, as a temporal prince, the very image of the ancient emperors? Is he not, as the pretended infallible head of the church, the great idol of all zealous papists? and is he not, in both respects, the representative of the whole antichristian tyranny? Can we then doubt who this “image” is? Or can we help being amazed at this exact and circumstantial prediction of such improbable events, so many hundred years before they took place? The two horned beast, or the Roman clergy, as represented by the consistory of cardinals, which assembles at the death of a pope, with the full concurrence of the rulers and people at large, through the papal dominions, “makes the image,” when they elect a private person to that exalted station; and, by putting him in possession of the supreme authority, they “give life to him” as “the image” of the ten horned beast, and “enable him to speak,” by uttering his bulls and mandates, as well as to use the names of blasphemy before mentioned. (Note, 5—7.) But before this, they robe and crown the image which they have made; they place him on an altar, and kiss his feet, and they call this ceremony adoration! Like other idolaters they make their idol, and then worship him: and an ancient medal, struck on that occasion, has this motto, Quem creant, adorant, ‘whom they create, they adore!’ Then they use all their power and influence to support his authority, through all the nations of their communion: and concur in persecuting even unto death all those, who will not join in the same idolatrous observance of it. The pope is the principle of unity to the ten kingdoms of the beast; and he causeth, ‘as far as he is able, all who will not acknowledge his supremacy to be put to death. In short he is the most perfect resemblance of the ancient Roman emperors; is as great a tyrant in the Christian, as they were in the heathen world; presides in the same city, usurps the same powers, affects the same titles, and requires the same homage and adoration. So that the prophesy descends more and more into particulars, from the Roman state, or the ten kingdoms in general, to the Roman clergy in particular; and then to the pope, the head of the state as well as of the church, the king of kings, as well as the bishop of bishops.’ Bp. Newton.—The two horned beast likewise performs other offices to the first beast; by excommunicating all those, who refuse subjection to its usurped dominion, and conformity to the established worship; and thus exposing them to various temporal incapacities and punishments, as outlawed persons. So that, of whatever rank they be, they must either be marked in their right hands and their foreheads, with “the mark, name, and number of the beast,” as slaves and cattle are branded and numbered; that is, they must openly profess the religion of the church of Rome, and conform to its idolatries and superstitions, as the bond slaves of the beast and his image, in body, soul, and conscience; and so be “marked with the name of the beast;” or they must be inhibited from all commercial dealings, and even excluded from the most needful intercourse with mankind. Very many instances of this sort are recorded in history; and indeed the spirit of it pervades the whole system. Thus the second beast, though appearing “as a lamb, spake like a dragon.”—By the mark of the beast, some understand the sign of the cross, which is used, not only in a most superstitious, but even an idolatrous manner, continually, as discriminating, and as required by authority in the church of Rome.—Some explain the making of the image, to mean the establishment of image-worship; and the various impostures, by which the deluded votaries were induced to suppose, that the images, lived, moved, and spoke. But, whoever consults the marginal references (u—f,) will perceive such a difference, and even contrast, between this image, and all others, mentioned in the whole scripture, (and doubtless other priests have possessed ingenuity, and bestowed pains, in deluding the people,) that he will hesitate at a conclusion, which makes this image in no respect essentially different from the others. If, however, life and speaking, might be interpreted to mean the priestcraft, which made the people think the images lived and spoke; surely what follows must be interpreted in a most unnatural manner, when the occasion taken by the priests to persecute, is spoken of in this language, “and the image of the beast shall both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed, &c.” It is indeed argued, that the original should be rendered, “made an image to the beast, or for his use,” and not of him: but instances may be brought from the Greek writers of exactly similar expressions, where the meaning is indisputably according to our translation of this passage. Indeed if a literal image, or literal images, be meant; and yet the beasts are not supposed to be literal beasts, or the horns to be literal horns; this blending of the literal with the figurative, in the same prophecy, is not only contrary to the rules of sound interpretation, but a direct violation of that laid down by the respectable writer, who has adopted this interpretation. “The whole book, excepting those few passages which are avowedly descriptive, must be understood either literally throughout, or figuratively throughout: otherwise it will be impossible to ascertain the meaning designed to be conveyed.’ Faber. On the other hand, if the pope be really this image, the language is both natural, and extremely expressive; and it has been fully verified in numerous instances, by papal interdicts, excommunications, and similar measures. The objections of late brought against this interpretation, have led me to perceive, that if preceding expositors could have foreseen, what their successors would have objected to their statement, they would have expressed themselves more cautiously and accurately: but they have produced no hesitation as to the meaning of the emblem.—It is true, that the pope may be considered, as in some sense the head also of the two horned beast: yet, that beast continues to exist, when there is no pope; and the cardinals, as representing the whole ecclesiastical power, are, during that vacancy, the head of the beast; and in that character they create the pope, to be the image both of the secular and the ecclesiastical idolatrous persecuting power the representative of the whole. He does not derive his dominion from any hereditary right, or from popular election, or from regal appointment; but he is the creature of the Romish clergy: yet, being created by them, he is the object of their worship, and exercises, or at least claims a right to exercise, absolute authority over both them and the kings of the earth. Indeed this claim was long generally admitted by the ten horns of the beast, though in some instances it was disputed. (Notes, 17:9—18.) This seems sufficient for the purpose, and, amidst so many emblems, it could hardly be supposed, that no shadow of coincidence should appear.—‘It may be observed, that when the first, or secular beast is represented, as making war with the saints, and overcoming them; it is no where said, that the second, or ecclesiastical beast, should do more than cause them to be killed. The little horn has always worn out the saints, by delivering them over to the secular arm, not by slaying them himself. The inquisitors, with a disgusting affectation of lamb-like meekness, are wont to beseech the civil magistrates to show mercy to those unfortunate victims, whom they themselves have given up to be consigned to the flames.’ Faber. (Note, 5—7.)—There are various other interpretations, by different writers, of several things in these chapters, chiefly explaining them of recent events in France; but not judging any of them either well grounded, or even supported by probable arguments, I did not think it needful to introduce them in this work. The books, written expressly on the subject, must be referred to: and, in general, the writers succeed better in attempting to refute each other’s interpretation, than in establishing their own; where they materially differ from the expositors, who wrote before these late transactions.—Mr. Cunningham, if I rightly understand him, supposes the corrupt church itself to be the image; as formed by the joint consent of the clergy and laity; but of what is the corrupt church the image? It cannot be the image of the beast, or the secular idolatrous persecuting power, (Notes, 1—7.) as this image is expressly said to be (11); nor, as it appears to me, of any thing, except itself, or of those who made it, who are nearly or quite the same persons. ‘It was a common fashion in St. John’s time, for every heathen god to have a particular society or fraternity belonging to him: and the way of admitting any into these fraternities was; 1. By giving him some hieroglyphic mark in the head, or forehead, which was accounted sacred to that particular god; as that of an ivy-leaf to ... the ‘fraternity of Bacchus: 2. By sealing themselves with the name of that god’ and 3. ‘With that number, which the Greek letters of their name did make up.’ Grotius in Crescenser. I suppose, the name of their idols. Slaves also were generally branded with the name of their owners.

18 <sup>s</sup> Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding, count the number of the beast: for it is <sup>h</sup> the number of a man; and his number is six hundred threescore and six.

Note.—Mention having been made of “the number of the beast,” or that “of his name,” the apostle next proposed to men’s consideration the number itself; introducing it by saying, “Here is wisdom;” or intimating that the discovery of the name of the beast from the number, would be a proof of a man’s discernment. “Let him,” therefore, “that hath understanding, count the number of the beast:” who then shall censure or ridicule those who attempt to do it? (Note, 1:3.) For it was “the number of a man;” either such a number as men use, or a number implying in it the name, title, or distinguishing characteristic “of a man.” Now the Greek word Lateinos signifies the Latin man; or the man of Latium, from which city the Romans derived their original and their language; and this word, according to the genuine orthography, contains, in numerical letters, exactly the “number six hundred and sixty-six.” The church of Rome is properly the Latin church, and they use the Latin language in every thing. The beast, therefore, or the authority exercised through the ten kingdoms in support of that church, of which the pope is the living image, may well be called LATEINOS. But though the apostle wrote in Greek, he yet used a few Hebrew names in this book; so we may perhaps think he alluded to a name in that language: and it is most astonishing that the word Romiith in Hebrew, which answers to Lateinos, signifying Roman, contains in numerical letters exactly six hundred and sixty-six. Nor can any other two words be produced from two different languages, which so nearly agree together in meaning, and exactly stand for the same number in numerical letters: the coincidence is really most surprising. As John could only refer to the Greek or the Hebrew language in this matter; and as the number of the name of the Latin man, or the Roman, in both languages is exactly the number of the beast; I see no occasion to doubt, either about the beast or his number, especially as Irenæus in the second century put the same construction on it.—Romiith is indeed feminine; but it may signify either the Roman church, or kingdom, the Hebrew words for both which are feminine. The word Latinus, or Lateinos, is, however, in all respects by far the most satisfactory, notwithstanding this coincidence.—‘No name, though it may possibly comprehend the number six hundred and sixty-six, can be the name of the beast, unless it equally answers in every other particular to the prophetic description of that name.—Lateinos is at once the name of 'a man, (the ancient king of Latium, whence 'Rome had its origin,) the title of an empire; and the distinguishing appellation of every individual in that empire: and when the sum of its numerical letters is taken in the Greek language, ... it amounts to six hundred and sixty-six. On these grounds then, I do not hesitate to assert, that Latinus, and nothing but Latinus, is the name of the beast; for in no other word, descriptive of the revived temporal beast, or the papal Roman empire, can such a fatal concurrence of circumstances be found.' Faber.—The mark of the beast is the sign of the cross, used in endless superstitions, and even idolatries.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The enemies of the church carry on their designs, under a variety of odious and terrifying forms: they often unite, or divide among them, the fierceness and cruelty of savage beasts, with the subtlety and poison of serpents: but if it will answer their purpose better, they appear as gentle "lambs," in order that, when they have opportunity, they may speak "as dragons," and "lord it over God's heritage" with cruel tyranny. (Notes, Matt. 7:15—20. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) They have commonly possessed great power: and when any of the heads of this Leviathan seemed to be broken in pieces, they have been again healed; and in another form they, even to this day, return to the combat. Indeed, they have much encouragement from the world: for men are far more disposed to admire, and to celebrate the praises of these monsters of iniquity, (as if none were like them, or could stand before them,) than to hear the word of God from his faithful witnesses, or even to adore and submit to the Son of God himself! But the mouths, even of those, who "open them in blasphemy," were given by that God whom they thus affront; and that power is derived from him, which they use in "making war against his saints:" nor can men of any description reign over the nations, or practise against the church, further than he sees good to permit. (Notes, Ps. 76:10. John 19:8—12.)—All will, in one way or other, be "deceived, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb that was slain," "according to the eternal purpose which he hath purposed in himself." "The vengeance that is written" will surely be executed on all persecutors and wicked oppressors; but the saints need very much "faith and patience," when their lot is cast in evil times; and they should cry unto God continually, that they may be "faithful unto death, and so receive the crown of life."—Ungodly priests, and tyrannical rulers, support each other's usurpations, iniquities, exactions, and oppressions: whilst the one by war, or cruel executions, destroy all opposers; and the other deceive or terrify men by lying miracles, false doctrines, anathemas, and ecclesiastical censures. But all these evils should be considered as illustrative of the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart, (Note, Jer. 17:9,10.) and as endearing to us the love of God in Christ Jesus. The review ought also to make us thankful for our civil and religious liberties, in this highly favored land. We are exposed to no interdicts, no prisons, no cruel tortures or death, for not worshipping after the manner, or at the dictate, of either prince or priest; nor are we tempted, by circumstances of danger, to profess and subscribe what we do not believe, or conform to what we do not approve; though alas! numbers choose to do it, "for filthy lucre's sake." (Note, 1 Tim. 6:6—10.) We shall therefore be doubly inexcusable, if we do not embrace and profess the truth of Christ, and worship the Father according to the appointed ordinances: or if we do not pray for the peace of those, under whose mild government we enjoy so many privileges; observing the rule of the wise man, to "fear God and the king, and not to meddle with those that are given to change." But he who has wisdom and understanding in these things, will see that all the enemies of God are numbered and marked out to destruction; that the term of their power will soon expire, and that all nations shall at length submit to our "King of righteousness and peace."

guile; for they are 'without fault before the throne of God.

Note.—The apostle, having been shown the foregoing particulars concerning Papal Rome, the antichristian secular and ecclesiastical domination of the Beast, and its image, with all idolatry and tyranny connected with them; had next a vision of the true "church in the wilderness," during the same period: which had special reference to the darkest times, previous to the dawning of the reformation. He "looked, and behold a Lamb," the emblem of Christ, "stood on mount Sion," where the temple was built, which was a type of the true church and of heaven itself; and with him were "a hundred and forty-four thousand" persons. (Notes, 7:1—8.) This seems a mystical number, the twelve patriarchs multiplied by the twelve apostles, and both multiplied by a thousand; as if the hundred and forty-four were leaders of thousands: so that there was a considerable number of true Israelites, and of those who held the apostles' doctrine, and marched under their banner, in the most degenerate times; being the successors of that remnant, which was found, in the first three centuries, during the persecutions of the heathen emperors. (Notes, 7:9—17. Rom. 11:1—6.) As the worshippers of the beast "were marked with his name and number;" (Note, 13:13—17.) so these disciples of Christ had "the name of his Father" written in legible characters on their foreheads: they were his worshippers, they bore his image, they avowed and evidently showed that they belonged to him.—It is evident from history, that there were such persons, in the darkest times, who ventured and laid down their lives for the truth and worship of the gospel. Indeed these were the same as the two witnesses during the times in which they lived, only represented under another emblem. (Notes, 11:1—14.)—This multitude were "singing a new song before the throne," with a voice loud as that of mighty rushing waters, or that of thunder; yet exquisitely harmonious, and accompanied with the music of harpers of consummate skill. No doubt "the new song," which they sang, accorded to that which has been already considered. (Notes, 5:3—10. 7:9—12.—Ps. 33:2,3. 96:1. 98:1—3. Is. 24:16. 42:10—12.) This was sung in the presence of the emblematical representatives of the church and its ministers; (Note, 4:6—8.) and none could learn it, but the redeemed. (Note, 2:17.) For, as it related immediately to redemption; the proud, the impenitent, the unbelieving, and the carnal, could not understand the nature or the glory of this subject: nor could angels join in it, not being "redeemed to God by the blood of the Lamb;" though they unite in worshipping him, as worthy to receive all honor and blessing. (Note, 5:11—14.)—The antichristian church at an early period discouraged and reviled marriage, enjoined celibacy on priests, immured numbers of both sexes in convents, extolled virginity as almost essential to piety and purity, and ranked its virgins with the saints and martyrs of the primitive times. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) But these unnatural restrictions, and attempts to introduce a kind of life on earth, which in general only suits the inhabitants of heaven, made way, not only for exorbitant spiritual pride, but also for the most unnatural and detestable licentiousness, and for crimes too horrid to be specified: and at the same time, the church was polluted with the most manifest and abominable idolatry, or spiritual fornication. (Notes, 17:1—6.) But, says the apostle by the Spirit of prophecy, these true Christians "are they, who are not defiled with women." "Marriage being honorable in all, and the bed undefiled, the clause may be understood in the literal sense, and also figuratively: "For," says he, "they are virgins," even such as the scripture commends, who are espoused to Christ, and unfeignedly love him, who are faithful and obedient to him; and deeming themselves his alone and wholly, wait for the completion of their sacred union with him; and in the mean time prefer suffering and death to the spiritual fornication and adultery to which all others are given up. (Notes, 19:1—6. Cant. 1:3. 2 Cor. 11:1—6.) They therefore "followed him, whithersoever he went," through persecutions and tribulations, into obscurity, or into prisons, with self-denial, obedient faith, and patient hope; "taking up their cross," and copying his example of meekness, purity, and love. (Notes, John 10:26—31. 12:23—26.) These were the persons, "who had been redeemed from among men," being actually interested in the atonement of Christ; and they were consecrated to God "as first-fruits," (for whose sake he spared others,) and to the Lamb, "as purified unto him, to be his peculiar people, zealous of good works." (Notes, Tit. 2:14.) They were not hypocrites, but upright in their repentance, faith, and love; and they held, professed, and preached the true doctrine of Christ; so that they were accepted and sanctified persons, against whom no charge could be alleged "before the throne of God." (Notes, Ps. 32:1,2. John 1:47—51.)—"The hundred and forty-four thousand appeared to the apostle, as standing on 'the mount Sion, or in the true church, because they constituted the persecuted church in the wilderness: (Rev. 12:6—14.) and as the followers of the beast have the mark and name of the beast; so have these the seal of God impressed, (Rev. 7:3.) and the name of God written on their foreheads. They alone are able to learn the new song of the heavenly harpers, because they alone are the worshippers of the one true God, through the one true mediator Jesus Christ; the adherents of the apostacy offering up their devotions to other objects, and through other mediators. They are virgins, undefiled with women, inasmuch as they are free from the pollutions of idolatry; which is spiritual whoredom and adultery. They follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, resolutely adhering to the religion of Christ in troublesome times, as well as in prosperous ones, and fleeing into sequestered valleys and wild deserts, rather than relinquish their profession of the Gospel. They are "redeemed from among men," being rescued, by the almighty power of divine grace, from the corruptions and abominations of Babylon; and they are consecrated as the first-

'fruits of Christianity, unto God and the Lamb, 'an earnest and assurance of a more plentiful 'harvest, first, at the era of the reformation, 'and afterwards at the yet more glorious era of 'the Millennium. "In their mouth was found 'no guile:" inasmuch as they handle not the 'word of God deceitfully, like popish venders 'of indulgences, and preachers of purgatory, 'human merit, and idolatry; but faithfully and 'simply declare the way of everlasting life. 'And they are "without fault before the throne 'of God," having "washed their robes and 'made them white in the blood of the Lamb;" 'God not imputing their trespasses unto them, 'but accounting them as if they had never sinned, through the imputed righteousness of 'Christ, who was "made sin for them," 'in 'order that they might be made the righteous- 'ness of God in him." By these hundred and 'forty-four thousand, I understand peculiarly 'the depressed church in the wilderness, previ- 'ous to the time of the Reformation: for his- 'tory sufficiently demonstrates, that there have 'been in every age some faithful worshippers, 'who consented not to the general apostacy, 'but who prophesied, although in sackcloth, 'against its abominations.' Faber.—They who object to this, saying that the church was then in a depressed state; but here exulting and triumphing with joyful praises, seem to forget the Christian's motto; "sorrowful, but always rejoicing." "We glory in tribulations also, &c." (Notes, Is. 24:13—15. Rom. 5:3—5. 8:32—39.)—Zion also was indeed a conspicuous place in the church; but not like the celebrated cities of Greece and Rome. It is very obscure, and little noticed in profane history. (Notes, Ps. 2:4—6. 87: Is. 12:4—6. Heb. 12:22—25. 1 John 3:1—3.)—First-fruits. (4) Note, Jam. 1:16—18.

7 Saying, <sup>b</sup> with a loud voice, <sup>c</sup> Fear God, <sup>d</sup> and give glory to him; for <sup>e</sup> the hour of his judgment is come: and <sup>f</sup> worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters.

Note.—It is generally admitted, by the best interpreters, that the three angels, introduced in these and the following verses, were emblematical heralds of the progressive reformation from popery. When, therefore, the extent and prevalence of the power of the beast, at its full height, had been predicted in the foregoing chapter; the diminution and weakening of it, as introductory to his destruction, is intimated in this. Some explain the proclamation of the first angel, of the ninth, tenth, or eleventh centuries: and no doubt there were even then, both princes, bishops, and councils, who struggled against the worship of images, and the other grosser abominations of the church of Rome. Yet they generally concurred in supporting the dominion of the beast; though they were earnest that it should be exercised in a different manner as to some particulars. Such, however, as were real Christians, and entered a proper protest against the prevailing corruptions of the church, whether in the imperial palace, or in the conclave, (if that was ever done,) may properly be ranked in the number mentioned in the preceding verses: for these evidently relate to a later and more public and general protestation. Others, however, seem to fix the time of their accomplishment too late; and so leave a large vacant space in the series of predicted events; and then crowd too many into the remaining periods.—We may, therefore, I apprehend, interpret this "first angel," messenger, or herald, to be an emblem of those who first publicly erected the standard of reformation, and who contended for "the everlasting gospel" of Christ, in opposition to all the innovations and usurpations of the beast, his image, and the false prophet. This honor seems to belong to the Waldenses and Albigenses, who had the true gospel among them; avowed its everlasting obligation and excellency; opposed it to the authority of popes, councils, and persecuting princes; declared the pope to be antichrist; and propagated their doctrines with zeal and success, and multiplied into a vast number of churches. And after immense slaughter had been made of them by persecutions and bloody wars, the residue still retained their tenets, and being dispersed into other countries, they rapidly carried "the everlasting gospel" with them; as an angel, a messenger of peace to men, flying through the midst of heaven: so that the Lollards in England, and the Bohemians in Bohemia, and the adjacent regions, and many others in different places, seem to have principally learned the gospel from them: nay, the reformation itself appears to have sprung from the seed which they sowed, and watered with rivers of their blood. So exact was the prophecy, that they had "the everlasting gospel, to preach to the inhabitants of the earth!" (Note, 11:3—6.) They also loudly called on men to fear and glorify God, as the hour of his judgment was at hand; and to worship the Creator of all things, as revealed in the gospel, by refusing to join the worship of idols, and that of the beast and his image. (Notes, 19:9,10. Acts 14:11—18. 17:22—29.)—Some respectable commentators explain these verses of Luther, almost exclusively, and suppose, that many things, in his situation, character, and testimony, remarkably answered to it. I cannot however think, that the previous public testimonies against the beast, are wholly passed over, or that an individual, however illustrious, occupies so conspicuous a station in this concise prophecy. But I am much farther from being convinced, that more modern events, or the present zeal for missions, is meant; because the testimony of the angel, or messenger, was evidently borne against pop- ery, not heathen idolatry; and the worship of saints and angels, and of images of God, is as real idolatry, as that of the pagans.—Everlasting, &c. (6) 'It is styled, "The everlasting gospel;" being like its divine Author, "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;" in opposition to the doctrines of the east, and the false prophet, which shall be "rooted up, as 'not of the heavenly Father's planting." Matt. 15:13.' Bp. Newton.—It is objected, that the reformers did not "preach to every nation, kindred, and tongue;" and it may be answered, that neither did the apostles, in the strict literal import of the words; (Col. 1:6,23.) nor have any others to this day. But it was the doctrine and desire of the reformers, that the gospel should be preached throughout the earth.—The angel "had the everlasting gospel." This is by Mr. Cunninghame supposed to be the book containing the gospel, and he seems principally to explain it of the British and Foreign Bible Society.—Far be it from me to withhold or deduct from the honor justly due to that Society: when by the astonishing success of atheists and infidels, "the enemy came in like a flood," "the Spirit of God has" surprisingly "lifted up a standard against him;" and the Bible Society has been honored in this, as in no small degree THE STANDARD BEARER. But we must not interpret prophecy by our partialities, or even most legitimate affections; and the order of events, in the whole arrangement of the prophecy, requires a far different interpretation.

8 And there followed another angel, saying, <sup>h</sup> Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that great city, <sup>i</sup> because she made all nations drink of the wine of <sup>k</sup> the wrath of her fornication.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—If we explain the first angel, as the herald of the dawning of the reformation, in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries; we may properly explain this of the Bohemians and others in the fifteenth, who were their genuine offspring and successors. Some of these persons, with still greater confidence and vehemence, than the Albigenses, declared Rome to be mystical Babylon, and the pope and church there to be antichrist; and they endured severe persecutions for these protestations, and for their profession of the gospel. John Huss and Jerom of Prague, especially, were perfidiously and cruelly burned by the council of Constance; which council was, in fact, the united power of the whole antichristian beast. These heralds announced the fall of mystical Babylon, as the ancient prophets had done that of literal Babylon, long before the event. (Notes, Is. 21:6—9. Jer. 50:2,3. 51:7—9.) Neither was this doom more certain, than it would be just; as she had corrupted and intoxicated the nations, not only with her love potions, as a seducing harlot, but by the wine of the wrath of her fornications, terrifying men into idolatry by fierce persecutions. (Notes, 17:1—6, Jer. 25:15—26. 51:7.) As Rome was mentioned under the name and emblem of a

Gentile city, so her idolatry was called fornication rather than adultery; as it generally is in scripture, when committed by the professed worshippers of God. (17:2.)—Bishop Newton explains this verse of the Waldenses, and the foregoing verses of more ancient events; on the contrary, Mr. Faber interprets those verses of Luther, and this of Calvin and his associates. This, however, seems to me, to render individuals far too prominent in so concise a prophecy. Nor should I have mentioned the names of John Huss and Jerom of Prague, except as they were the mouth, or voice, of a very large body of men, delivering its testimony in the most public manner conceivable, and sealing it by martyrdom.—Still, I observe, that the grand outlines are clear; and commentators in general are agreed about them: so that the subordinate differences of opinion do not affect the main argument.—Some indeed would explain this verse of future times, because Babylon is not yet totally fallen: but this deranges the whole plan of interpretation, adopted by the ablest expositors, which is the only clue that can lead us through its mazes; and this would introduce perplexity and uncertainty. Nothing is more common in prophecy, than for future events, as absolutely determined, to be spoken of in the present or past time: and the same words were spoken of literal Babylon, long before her destruction. (Marg. Ref. h.)—The clue that has principally conducted me through both parts of the Revelation, is following the series of history, and the successive order of events. After the description of the two beasts, secular and ecclesiastical, whose power was established according to my hypothesis in the eighth century, but, according to most commentators, much sooner; there would be a very large chasm, without the prediction of any memorable event, if these prophecies relate to the time, immediately preceding the fall of Antichrist and the Millennium.—What a long interval would there be without any prophecy; and how thick would the events follow afterwards! For all the particulars ... to the end of the nineteenth chapter must be fulfilled before the Millennium.' Bp. Newton.—It is also worthy of notice, that about the era above mentioned, the opinion began to be publicly avowed, by several persons, that the church, court, and city of Rome, were Babylon, and so inevitably doomed to destruction.

9 And the third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, <sup>m</sup> If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand,

Note.—This third angel, and his proclamation “with a loud voice” may be explained of Luther, and his loud, rough, and vehement protestation against the idolatries of the church and bishop of Rome, and that whole antichristian fabric: yet we must also take in all his coadjutors and successors, and all the effects of this combined and persevering protestation, to this day, and even beyond it. His voice, with that of those who were raised up in divers countries to join him, and to follow up the assault, was indeed very “loud.” They attacked the beast with far more vehemence, than any who went before had done. They not only declared him to be antichrist; but they carried their researches into the idolatries, iniquities, and impostures of the whole papal system; and showed that it was utterly incompatible with the religion of the scriptures, and founded in ignorance, usurpation, avarice, and hypocrisy. And they insisted strongly on the necessity of separating from so corrupt a church; boldly retorting the charge of heresy and schism, which the popish party brought against them, and fully proving it against their opponents. Thus they induced whole nations to cast off all regard to the church of Rome, and engaged vast multitudes to protest against popery as a dannable religion, not only in the persecuting tyrants who imposed it, but in all who, even from dread of persecution, or from more corrupt motives, conformed to it: and this was exactly the purport of the third angel’s proclamation. They loudly insisted upon it, that all who adhered, with a blind and devoted attachment, to the beast and his image; (Notes, 13:11—17.) professing their abominable doctrines, conforming to their idolatries, concurring in their cruelties, and reducing their principles to practice; (being intoxicated with “the wine of the wrath of her fornications;”) would drink of the unmingled wine of God’s wrath, from the cup of his indignation. (Notes, 16:17—21. Ps. 75:8. Is. 51:17—20. Jer. 25:15—17.) Yea, that they would be tormented with fire and brimstone, or be cast into hell, to be tormented in that flame; that this would be “in the presence of the holy angels,” who would applaud the justice of their punishment; “and in the presence of the Lamb,” who would pronounce and execute the sentence upon them for their opposition to his gospel, and for giving his mediatorial glory to saints and angels: and “that the smoke of their torment would ascend up for ever and ever.” The words translated “for ever and ever,” are the most energetic which are found in the whole Greek language, to signify eternity, and seem incapable of any other meaning. (Note, 7:9—12.) The passage, therefore, evidently predicts the clear and strong manner, in which these reformers would protest and argue against purgatory; and insist upon it, that the wicked will be “tormented in hell forever:” and a subsequent verse evidently opposes the same doctrine, by showing the immediate happiness of believers after death. (Note, 12,13.)—Every one, who is at all conversant with the writings of the reformers and their successors, knows that they generally declared, without hesitation, that popery was a dannable religion. Mr. Hooker, in Queen Elizabeth’s time, brought himself into suspicion, and was engaged in a controversy, because he asserted, with much caution, and many distinctions, that papists might be saved: and, whatever contempt may be cast on their bigotry, in this day of false candor, liberality, and disregard to the scriptures; it is worthy of serious consideration, whether this passage does not warrant by far the greatest part of what these reformers advanced on that subject; though they might not always exactly distinguish between those “who hated the light,” and those whose eyes were too weak to endure its effulgence, when it broke in upon them all at once.—To explain this most energetic passage, (which beyond doubt predicts a general and most awful protestation against the leading tenets of popery as dannable, in all who embrace and adhere to them, as well as in the inventors and imposers of them.) to signify any testimony, or protest made in a single kingdom, as for instance in England, seems to me a total departure from the grand scale, on which these prophecies should be interpreted; and as in all respects inadmissible. Nor can any temporal judgments on collective bodies, be the fulfilment of the awful denunciation, which evidently relates to individuals, and to each individual who is guilty: and if words can convey the idea of eternal punishment, it is here denounced. (Marg. Ref. p.—t.—Notes, 19:17—21. 20:7—10,11—15. Matt. 25:41—46.)—It may also be very well worth inquiring, whether there be not some remains of the papal superstition and corruption, even in protestant churches? And how far they, whose grand object it seems to be, to contend most, and most vehemently, not to say virulently, for that which admits of the least scriptural proof, or no scriptural proof, keep at a proper distance from this tremendous warning.

Note.—When the doctrines above mentioned began to be openly propagated, terrible persecutions were raised: it was therefore added, g Or, from henceforth saith the Spirit; yea.

“Here is the patience of the saints.” They would have abundant need to exercise patience and perseverance, in obeying God and holding the true doctrine of Christ, amidst the bloody race of inquisitors and persecutors, who kindled fires on earth to torture and burn them, though in vain they called for fire from heaven to destroy them; and who, by most horrid cruelties, together with wars and massacres, destroyed incredible multitudes, in opposing the progress of the reformation. (Notes, 13:8—10. 17:6.) To encourage the saints to patience, in suffering for the truth even unto death, the apostle showed, that he “heard a voice from heaven,” ordering him to write, “Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord,” (or in the true faith and hope of the gospel; Note, 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) “even from henceforth.”—This verse has much perplexed many commentators, in respect of its prophetic meaning and connexion: but, upon the plan which we are now pursuing, nothing can be more obvious. The doctrine of purgatory, with indulgences, human merits to be sold by the church, masses, and prayers for the dead; was one principal source of wealth, influence, and authority to the clergy of the church of Rome. This also first stirred up the spirit of Luther who began his attack by protesting against these atrocious practices: and, by examining the scriptures, he and his followers established it, as a certain truth, in the judgment of immense multitudes, that there was no such place as purgatory; but that the wicked, when they die, go directly to hell, and believers immediately enter heaven. Now what words could more aptly predict this change in the sentiments of a large proportion of professed Christians, than these do? It is evident, from the internal chronology of the book, and from the series of predicted events, that the reformation was here intended; and the apostle was ordered to write, just in this place, (probably he knew not on what account,) “Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, from henceforth:” that is, from this period believers will generally understand that encouraging truth; and not have to encounter the fears of purgatory, or to apprehend a delay of their felicity, when seized with the agonies of death, or called to suffer martyrdom for Christ’s sake. Indeed, it is an undeniable fact, that the expectation of immediate happiness, was the joy and support of those numbers, who were burned alive, or otherwise cruelly martyred, during those times.—This “voice from heaven” was attested by an internal suggestion of the Holy Spirit, who assured the apostle, that believers rested after death from all their labors and sufferings, and consequently could have no purgatory to fear; and that their works followed them, to prove the sincerity of their faith, and to ensure a gracious reward. (Notes, Matt. 25:34—40. Rom. 2:7—11. 2 Cor. 5:9—12. Marg. Ref. f.)—Rest. (13) 11. Note, Heb. 4:3—11.—To explain this of any state of the church on earth, is doing the greatest violence imaginable to the words of the apostle.—“Dying in the Lord,” and being immediately happy, must refer to individuals, and to another world. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—8. Phil. 1:21—26.)

18 And another angel <sup>t</sup> came out from the altar, <sup>u</sup> which had power over fire; <sup>x</sup> and cried with a loud cry to him that had the sharp sickle, saying, Thrust in thy sharp sickle, and gather the clusters of the vine of the earth; for her grapes <sup>y</sup> are fully ripe.

19 And the angel thrust in his sickle into the earth, and gathered the vine of the earth, <sup>z</sup> and cast it into the great wine-press of the wrath of God.

20 And <sup>a</sup> the wine-press was trodden <sup>b</sup> without the city, <sup>c</sup> and blood came out of the wine-press, even unto the horse-bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs.

Note.—Thus far we have generally proceeded, by the guidance of past events, and considerable satisfaction seems to have been obtained in explaining these prophecies; but here, I apprehend, that direction almost wholly fails us. This supposition is confirmed by the evident inability of expositors to make any regular and consistent application of the subsequent chapters, except as coincident with those things which have been already considered. Under this persuasion, of which further reasons will be afterwards assigned, I shall not obtrude mere conjectures on the reader, nor attempt to pry into “things not seen as yet.” Hitherto, in general, the ground has seemed good, and the road in a measure plain; and I have felt some confidence, as well as used caution, in the progress: but caution must be almost my only companion and monitor in what now remains; for the country is unknown, and no guide is to be found, who understands any thing with certainty concerning the road. The exact and surprising fulfilment of many and complicated predictions, through the course of about seventeen hundred years, has been shown, which is a real demonstration of the truth of the scriptures: but we must bequeath to posterity the satisfaction of understanding, and being filled with adoring wonder at witnessing the accomplishment of the remainder. The prophecy has been evidently traced down to the reformation; and this may include all, which has intervened to this day, or shall intervene, till "the slaying of the witnesses," and their resurrection; if these events be, as I firmly believe, yet future. (Notes, 11:7—14.) Whether the events here predicted precede or follow the sounding of the seventh trumpet, or third woe-trumpet, I cannot absolutely determine: but they seem evidently to relate to the fall of popery; and perhaps give a succinct intimation of what is more fully predicted in the next and following chapters. (Notes, 16:—19:)—The preceding judgments and transactions not having produced a voluntary and effectual reformation in the kingdom of the beast; the iniquity of the nations of which it is constituted is filled up, and they become ripe for judgments. (Notes, Gen. 15:16. Zech. 5:5—11. Matt. 23:29—39. 1 Thes. 2:13—16.) These judgments are emblematically described as a harvest and a vintage: and as the latter succeeds to the former in the course of nature, so it is subsequent to it in the prophecy, and will be by far the most terrible. (Note, Joel, 3:9—17.)—Christ appeared to the apostle in vision, "like unto the Son of Man," in human nature; upon "a white cloud," the emblem of his holy, righteous, and mysterious dispensations; his "golden crown" signified his supereminence authority, and "his sharp sickle" his terrible vengeance on his enemies. "The angel out of the temple" may signify the ministers of the gospel, as employed to announce the approach of these judgments: and "the second angel coming out of the temple," to reap the vintage, may represent some executioner, or succession of executioners, of the wrath of Christ on the opposers of his authority: while the third angel from the altar, who had power over fire, giving orders to the second angel to reap the vintage, implies, that these judgments would constitute a sacrifice to divine justice, and consume as with fire those, who had despised or perverted the atoning sacrifice of Christ. (Notes, 8:1—6. Ez. 9:1—7.) The "casting of the vintage into the wine-press of God's wrath," and the "treading of it without the city," (as being no part of the true church,) can only be explained by the event. (Note, 11:1,2.) But it is remarkable, that sixteen hundred furlongs, or two hundred miles, is exactly the length of the papal dominions in Italy; and probably these will be deluged with blood, in a most awful manner, which is represented by language tremendously hyperbolic. (Notes, Is. 34: 63:1—6. Jer. 51:33. Matt. 13: 36—43.)—Some expositors, who have written, since this interpretation was first made, (A. D. 1791.) decide with confidence, that the bloody scenes, lately exhibited in France and on the Continent, are the fulfilment of the prophecy concerning "the harvest;" though the vintage may be yet future; nor do I at all doubt, posterity will clearly see, that these events began to accomplish the prediction. I cannot however think, either that at so early a stage we are capable of determining on the subject; or that a more general and almost universal display of divine vengeance, on all the kingdoms of the beast, (those perhaps excepted, but those only, who have fully and decidedly cast off its dominion,) is intended by the harvest; as well as still more tremendous scenes by "the vintage." (Notes, 19:17—21. Ps. 149:7—9. Ez. 39:1—20. Mic. 7:14—17.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The Lord reserves a remnant to himself in the worst of times, who dissent from the prevailing idolatries and abominations; who profess his truth and bear his image; who sing the praises of redeeming grace, in strains which none else can learn; who cordially love and devotedly cleave to him; who "follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, being the first-fruits of the earth;" who "are Israelites indeed," "in whose mouth is found no guile," and who "are without fault," being fully accepted, and really sanctified, before the throne of God. May it be our prayer, our endeavor, yea, our ambition, to be found in this honorable company! If we have a good hope, that we are thus distinguished; we ought to do every thing in our power, as well as beseech the Lord continually, that faithful ministers, like beneficent angels, "flying through the midst of heaven," may carry "the everlasting gospel," and preach it to "all people, nations, and languages:" that so sinners may fear and glorify God; and turn from all their idols and iniquities, to worship the great Creator, and to wait for his Son from heaven, who shall speedily come to be our Judge. These events faith anticipates, as if they were already accomplished.

V. 9—20.

Subtle deceivers, and they who have been betrayed into their delusions by pride, unbelief, a carnal mind, love of sin, and fear of man, will ere long "drink together of the wine of God's wrath, from the cup of his indignation:" and, however men may flatter or excuse themselves, when they conform to corrupt and sinful customs or impositions, they will find at last that the Lord deeply abhors such prevarication.—Let, therefore, such as "fear the reproach" or the wrath of men, and are tempted to disobey God, remember that awful "torment," the smoke of which ascendeth up "for ever and ever." For the modern quietus of a purgatory, after the day of judgment, is as destitute of scriptural foundation, as the purgatory before that awful season, which is maintained by the church of Rome; and they who die in their sins, will too late find, that the punishment of hell will endure "for ever and ever." "Here then is the patience of the saints," to venture or suffer any thing, in "obeying the commandments of God," and professing "the faith of Jesus:" may God bestow this patience upon us, that we may be ready, should times of persecution overtake us! We have the best reasons in the world for this conduct; as a "voice from heaven," attested by the Holy Spirit, assures us, that "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord; that they 'immediately' rest from their labors, and that their works follow them," to ascertain their title to unspeakable felicity, and the degree of glory reserved for them: while their persecutors, and all wicked men, are ripening for the harvest and vintage of divine vengeance; and will soon be "cast into the wine-press of the wrath of God." Nor can the most tremendous judgments ever witnessed on earth, or even hereafter to be witnessed, as inflicted on nations ripe for vengeance, give so much as an adequate idea of the vengeance awaiting impatient workers of iniquity.

CHAP. XV.

A vision of seven angels prepared to execute judgments; with the triumphant song of the church on that occasion, 1—4. Seven vials are given to the angels for that purpose, and the temple is filled with smoke, 5—8.

Note.—This chapter introduces the seven vials, all of which fall under the seventh trumpet, as the seven trumpets were included under the seventh seal: for they contain "the seven last plagues," in which the wrath of God is filled up, or accomplished, on the persecuting idolatrous power, assuming, and disgracing beyond expression, the sacred name of CHRISTIAN. These plagues must therefore be coincident with the last woe-trumpet, in great measure at least. (Note, 11:15—18.) The second part of this prophecy has been traced from the latter years of the sixth trumpet, to the reformation, nay, to the present era: and to go back into former ages, to find out events, which may answer to the subsequent predictions, deranges the whole plan of the book, and reduces the interpretation to ambiguity and uncertainty. Our key has hitherto opened the most intricate wards of these predictions, without violence; that is, as far as to the latter part of the sixth trumpet: but no writer, as it appears to me, has yet (A. D. 1815) succeeded in what follows. For the commencement of it is, according to my view, precisely the time in which we live; as appears from a due consideration of the twelve hundred and sixty years of the reign of the beast.—Different computations, indeed, have been made of the period, when these years will end: yet none seem to have proved that they will terminate more early than A. D. 1840; while many think they will not end till A. D. 2000. But, whether sooner or later, it seems probable that the time is not arrived: and, therefore, that "the pouring out of the vials" has not yet begun.—Some indeed of late have fixed the beginning of this period (the 1260 days,) to A. D. 533; when the emperor Justinian issued certain edicts, acknowledging and supporting the Pope, or the bishop of Rome, head of the whole church: and thus they compute, that they terminated A. D. 1792, the era of the French revolution.—If they be correct, of which I presume not to judge, then the pouring out of the vials has indeed begun: but they, who shall live at the latter end of this century, or the beginning of the next, will, I have little doubt, know, that it has but just begun.—The apostle had mentioned great woes, which would come under the three last trumpets: (8:13. 10:7. 14:19, 20.) yet when the seventh trumpet was sounded, he mentioned, almost exclusively, the happy effects of it, to the end of time, without speaking particularly about the woes. (Note, 11:15—18.) But here he resumes that subject, and prophetically shows what woes would follow the sounding of that trumpet. Nothing is more important, in explaining prophecies, than to determine, as far as we can, which events are past, and which are to come: under this conviction, I must proceed to consider what follows, in general, as in futurity; and shall therefore not detail any of the interpretations, or conjectures, which have been made of them, with relation to past events; because I cannot myself find any satisfaction from them.—The great and marvellous sign, which the apostle saw in heaven, the scene of his visions, (Note, 4:1—3.) implied, that very interesting and extraordinary events were about to be revealed: for seven angels appeared, who had it in charge to inflict "the seven last plagues." But before he saw the effects of their ministry, he records an introductory vision, representing the joy and triumph, which the church would express on that occasion.—The "sea of glass, mingled with fire," (Note, 4:6—8.) is very differently explained: but as the persons referred to stood upon it, we cannot so well understand it of the Fountain, in which they had washed away their sins. Perhaps it was emblematical of the tempestuous times, during which believers then lived; the slippery and fragile nature of their standing considered in itself, and the fiery trials which they endured. Some think that επι (translated on) may be rendered at: and that being "mingled with fire," denotes the purifying influences of the Holy Spirit. (Note, Matt. 3:11,12.)—They, however, who were conquerors over the beast, who had cleaved to the truth and will of God, and had refused subjection to the spiritual tyranny of antichrist, or to be branded as his slaves, (Note, 13:13—17.) stood on, or at, this "sea of glass mingled with fire" unhurt and undismayed; as the children of Israel passed through the Red Sea, or standing on its shore, saw their enemies dead before them. (Notes, Ex. 13:26—31.) Feeling, therefore, a holy assurance of their own safety, and a triumphant joy, in the prospect of the destruction of their persecutors, they "sang the song of Moses, the servant of God:" they praised the Lord for their deliverance, as Israel by orders from Moses had done; (Note, Ex. 15:1—21.) and they sang "the song of the Lamb," the new song before mentioned. (Notes, 5:8—10. 7:9—12.) Thus they celebrated the "great and marvellous works" of God, the Almighty Lord of all; and his justice and faithfulness, as in Christ Jesus "the King of saints," the Protector, Comforter, Ruler, and Portion, of all his redeemed people. In this view, they inquired, who would not, or ought not, to "fear," adore, and glorify the name of ГЕHOBAH; seeing he only was holy: therefore neither the worship of idols, nor the names of blasphemy, used by the beast and his image, were any longer to be endured: for the time was arrived, in which all should come and worship before the Lord; as his judgments had been, and were then about still more and more to be made manifest. (Marg. Ref. k—x.)

5 ¶ And after that I looked, and, behold, <sup>v</sup> the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened:

8 And <sup>e</sup> the temple was filled with smoke <sup>f</sup> from the glory of God, and from his power; and <sup>g</sup> no man was able to enter into the temple, <sup>h</sup> till the seven plagues of the seven angels were fulfilled.

Note.—(Note, 11:19.) The appearance of glory above the mercy-seat in the most holy place, "the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven," was an emblem of the appearance of God in heaven as reconciled to sinners, through Jesus Christ. "The seven angels," coming forth thence, showed, that these judgments would be executed on the enemies of the church, in mercy to the people of God; while the white clothing and golden girdles, worn by these ministers of vengeance, represented their holiness, and the righteousness and excellency of these awful dispensations. "The living creature," one of the four, an emblem of the gospel ministry, (Note, 4:6—8.) giving the vials to the angels, implied, that the preaching of the truth would be instrumental in bringing the judgments, which were written, upon antichristian opposers: and the temple being filled with smoke, showed the darkness of those dispensations, and the horror, which would envelope the enemies of God, whilst these plagues were executing. (Notes, Ex. 40:34,35. Lev. 9:22—24. 1 Kings 8:10—14. 2 Chr. 5:12—14.)—It is also highly probable, that the same judgments, by which the antichristian power, and other enemies of the church, shall be destroyed, will be employed to purify even the less corrupt parts of it: and in proportion to the degree in which unscriptural usages are contended for and imposed, or scriptural truths and duties are neglected, even professed protestant churches will drink of the cup. (Notes, Is. 59:1,2.) 'God 'will purify his church by such signal judgments, as shall arouse the attention of the 'whole world.' Bp. Horsley. So that the happy estate of the true church, as perhaps implied by "entering into the temple;" will not commence, till by the same awful dispensations, obstinate enemies shall be destroyed; and lukewarm, superstitious, or formal Christians shall be purified. Thus whatever is antiscritptural or unscriptural in every company being purged away, the whole, brought to purity, unity, and spirituality, in worship, discipline, doctrine, and practice, shall be firmly established. (Notes, Zeph. 3:9—17.)

The temple. (5) Ἡ οὐαὸς. The holy of holies seems to be meant.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The many plagues, which the wrath of God inflicts on the wicked, contain things "great and marvellous:" but none can fully understand them, till they have passed through the waves and fiery trials of this evil world, and are made victors over all their adversaries. Yet, while "we stand upon the sea of glass mingled with fire," we should anticipate the triumphs which await our final deliverance; and attempt "the song of Moses and of the Lamb;" and new mercies continually demand new hymns of praise. The fuller knowledge we acquire concerning the wonderful works of God, the more zealously we shall celebrate his infinite greatness and excellency, as "the Lord God Almighty," the Creator and Ruler of all worlds: but his title of Emmanuel, the "King of saints," will peculiarly endear him to us. Who, that considers the power of his wrath, the value of his favor, or the glory of his holiness, would refuse to fear and honor him alone? for his praise is above heaven and earth. May "all nations," therefore, "come and worship before him," and accept of his salvation! This prayer will be answered, when his tabernacle shall be opened, the executioners of his vengeance on obstinate rebels shall have executed their commissions, and the seven vials have been poured out. In the mean time, let us adore his justice and truth, and not dare to object to his deep designs: for when we shall

CHAP. XVI.

The first angel pours out his vial on the earth; and the worshippers of the beast are plagued with a noisome sore, 1,2: the second, on the sea, which becomes blood, 3: the third, on the rivers and fountains, which also become blood; and the angel of the waters celebrates the justice of God, in thus visiting bloody persecutors, which is confirmed by one from the altar, 4-7. The fourth angel pours his vial on the sun: and men, scorched with fire, blaspheme God, 3,9: the fifth on the seat of the beast, with the miseries caused, and the blasphemies excited, 10,11. The sixth angel pours his vial on the Euphrates, to prepare the way of eastern kings, 12. Three unclean frogs, from the mouth of the beast, stir up kings to war against God, 13,14. A warning to Christians, 15. The seventh angel pours his vial into the air, and the last plagues are tremendously finished on Babylon, &c. 16-21.

AND <sup>a</sup> I heard a great voice out of the temple, saying to <sup>b</sup> the seven angels, Go your ways, <sup>c</sup> and pour out the vials of the wrath of God upon the earth.

2 And the first went, and poured out his vial <sup>d</sup> upon the earth; and there fell <sup>e</sup> a noisome and grievous sore upon the men <sup>f</sup> which had the mark of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image.

Note.—The angels were next ordered, by a voice from the temple, to pour out the contents of “the vials,” censers, or cups, which they had received; and which were emblems of “the wrath of God” to be poured out on the antichristian empire, and on all who adhered to it; and indeed on all the opposers of pure Christianity.—As the first four trumpets were so many stages in the destruction of the western empire, and the fifth and sixth showed the extinction of the eastern empire: so these vials mark the gradual desolation of the Roman church, and the antichristian tyranny of the kingdoms which support it: the one being the pagan idolatrous persecuting power; the other, the papal idolatrous persecuting power, the beast to whom the dragon had given his seat and empire. (Note, 13:2-4.) This circumstance occasions a similarity of some of the vials to the trumpets. A resemblance also is found between these vials, and several of the plagues of Egypt; to which Rome may be compared for tyranny, cruelty, and enmity to the people of God. (Note, 11:7-12.) Whether “the noisome and grievous sore,” produced by the pouring out of the first vial, is to be understood literally, with respect to terrible pestilences, or in a figurative meaning, the event must determine. But the plague will be peculiar to the avowed and devoted adherents of the beast and his image; which seems to be intended of the others, though not so expressly mentioned. (Marg. Ref.)—Mr. Faber, without hesitation, interprets this plague, of the atheistical spirit, which has long secretly pervaded the nations, adhering to the Roman church; and which broke out so extensively and fatally about the time of the French revolution. I am by no means disposed to argue against this interpretation: yet I am not able to adopt it, as a probable opinion; even if ‘the pouring out of the vials’ may, in the order of the predicted events, be allowed to begin at so early a period; which seems to me inadmissible. Many others, beside devoted papists, were involved in the effects of this atheism and infidelity: but the predicted judgment is stated as selecting them for its exclusive objects.

3 ¶ And the second angel poured out his vial <sup>g</sup> upon the sea; and <sup>h</sup> it became as the blood of a dead man: <sup>i</sup> and every living soul died in the sea.

7 And I heard another <sup>r</sup> out of the altar say, <sup>s</sup> Even so, Lord God almighty, true and righteous are thy judgments.

Note.—(Note, 8:8-11.) “Seas, rivers, and fountains,” turned into blood, are proper emblems of vast slaughter and devastation. Yet “the angel of the waters,” who was appointed to preside over them, or to be “a ministering spirit” in these dispensations, celebrated the justice of the eternal Lord, who had determined to punish, with such calamities, the blood thirsty murderers of saints and prophets; and in appointing them, as it were, “blood to drink.” (Notes, 17:3-6. 18:20. 19:1-6. Ex. 1:22. 7:21-23.) And another angel, “from under the altar,” (Note, 6:9-11.) as speaking in the name of the holy martyrs, concurred in these praises; and also declared the truth of “the Lord God Almighty,” in thus fulfilling his ancient predictions, and his promises to his church.—If the events here predicted be still future, the fulfilment of the prophecy alone can clearly explain it. Mr. Faber, however, interprets the whole passage, of the bloody transactions in France and on the Continent, which have occurred during these last twenty years. I presume not to decide, whether his opinion be well grounded or not: yet I object to it for these reasons. 1st. The stage, on which these tragedies have been acted, seems by no means large enough for the completion of the prophecy. France, and the countries connected with it, form only part of the kingdom of the beast; and several countries belonging to it, have hitherto been little affected by these sanguinary measures; though perhaps they may ere long be involved in them: in fact many since the time when this was first written, have been, though not in that degree, or to that extent, which the prophecy seems to require. 2dly. The term, since the commencement of the French revolution seems too short, to answer to the idea, excited by this prophecy, of the judgments to be inflicted: when it is considered, in how few verses the most interesting events perhaps of two or three hundred years are comprehended. 3dly. I doubt whether the time for the pouring out of the vials is arrived; and whether it will arrive, till after the middle of this century.—It seems, however, still more improper to suppose all the seven vials coincident, and all as having been begun already to be poured.

9 And men were * scorched with great heat, and <sup>x</sup> blasphemed the name of God, which hath power over these plagues: <sup>y</sup> and they repented not <sup>z</sup> to give him glory.

Note.—(Note, 8:12.) Whether burning seasons producing drought and famine, or some other judgment figuratively described, by the scorching heat of the sun, be intended, the event must show. But the extreme distress of the sufferers, instead of inducing them to glorify God, by confessing, repenting of, and forsaking their sins, will irritate them to blaspheme the name of God, and so tend to the increase of their guilt and final condemnation. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 10,11,17—21.)—These verses are interpreted by Mr. Faber, to mean the present tyranny of the ruler of France, over that nation, and the other kingdoms of the beast, on the Continent. Not being disposed to controvert this interpretation, and much less to subscribe to it, I only again observe, that in my view, our posterity, at the end of this century, will be more competent judges of this subject, than we can be.

Note.—This predicts some great calamity to Rome itself, yet of such a nature as will darken the whole antichristian empire. (Notes, 18:.) But it will only excite the sufferers to more horrid blasphemies, and more desperate defiance of God.—Interpreters of these prophecies in general allow, that this vial is not yet poured out: and this is a sufficient reason, why a com- mentator should decline giving any conjecture, in what manner so compendious and so obscure a prediction will be fulfilled. When fulfilled, it will cease to be obscure.

Note.—If the river Euphrates is here to be understood literally; some eastern nation or nations may be expected to invade Europe, or to meet the forces of the antichristian power, in the western parts of Asia, perhaps in Palestine, as the executioner of the Lord's vengeance on the kingdom of the beast. (Notes, Ps. 149: 7—9. Is. 34: 63:1—6. Ez. 38: 39: Dan. 2: 44,45. 7:9—12. 11:40—45. Mic. 5:10—15. 7: 14—17. Zech. 14:12—19.) But as Rome is mystical Babylon, and as Babylon stood on the river Euphrates, and was both enriched and protected by it: perhaps we may understand, by the drying up of the Euphrates, such an enfeebling of the power of Rome, and increase of that of its enemies, as shall embolden and excite the nations to attack her. These events, however, will threaten the destruction of that whole kingdom and domination: so that “three unclean spirits, like frogs, will come out of the mouth of the dragon,” as representing Satan, who gave his power to the beast; “out of the mouth of the beast,” or antichristian empire; and “out of that of the false prophet,” or the antichristian church and clergy. (Notes, 13:1—12.) That is, emissaries, commissioned by them, and instigated by unclean spirits, being loathsome, and croaking, and intruding themselves into every place, to the mischief of all, (Note, Ez. 8:1—6.) will go forth to promote idolatry, pretending to work miracles in support of their doctrine; and to collect "the kings of the earth, and of the whole world," even all in every place who favor that design, that they may make one united effort against the cause of God: and thus they will be "gathered for the battle of the great day," in which the almighty God intends to destroy them.—Some have imagined these three mystical frogs, to be the Dominicans, the Franciscans, and the Jesuits; and the description given of them would agree well enough with the character of those Janizaries of the church of Rome: but the predicted events must fall much later than the founding of those orders; and Satan will no doubt be able to excite men of the same stamp, for similar services with those performed by them in former ages.—These will be times of great temptation; and therefore Christ, by his apostle, called on his professed servants, to expect his sudden coming, and "to watch," that they might retain and be found in the garments of salvation, and not "walk naked" and so be put to shame, as apostates or hypocrites: for the blessing would belong only to the watchful. This parenthesis interrupts the prediction; which proceeds to show, that He, even the Lord, gathered together the kings of the earth, in his righteous providence, to a place called Armageddon, or the mountain of destruction, with reference to Megiddo. (Judg. 5:19. 2 Kings 23:29,30. Note, Joel 3:9—17.)—The coincidence between this prophecy, and those referred to in the notes, as unfulfilled prophecies in the Old Testament is worthy of special notice; by all, who would patiently investigate the true meaning of them, and not run away with hasty and crude and partial, though plausible interpretations, grounded on incidental resemblances.—False prophet. (14) The same as the second or two horned beast. (Note, 13: 11,12.)

18 And there <sup>g</sup> were voices, and thunders, and lightnings; and there was <sup>h</sup> a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great.

19 And <sup>i</sup> the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell: and <sup>k</sup> great Babylon came <sup>l</sup> in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath.

20 And <sup>m</sup> every island fled away, and the mountains were not found.

21 And <sup>n</sup> there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent: and men <sup>o</sup> blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great.

Note.—Satan is called "the prince of the power of the air," (Note, Eph. 2:1,2.) and this last vial will be poured into the very seat of his empire: for after it, his cause in every place, without, as well as within, the dominions of the beast, will be finally ruined. A proclamation was therefore made from "the temple of heaven, ... saying, It is done," or finished; for "under the seventh trumpet the mystery of God was to be finished." (Note, 10:5—7.) Terrible calamities, awful displays of the divine presence; intestine distractions, and the revolt or destruction of cities and nations, &c. will make way for "great Babylon to drink of the wine of the fierceness of God's wrath." (Notes, 14:8—11. 18: Jer. 25:26. 51:7—9.) The concurrent judgments are here described in most energetic language; especially, by hailstones of above a hundred pounds weight each, which must dash in pieces all persons and things whatever, on which they fall. How this is to be understood, the event must show. (Note, 11:15—18.)—It would be very easy to give an opinion, or to quote from those who have done this: but the author would refer the reader to those, who have purposely written on the subject. It is however clear, beyond doubt, that convulsions, revolutions, and the wreck of nations, to a degree and extent never hitherto witnessed or recorded, are yet to be expected, before "the mystery of God is finished."—The opinion also, that the land of Canaan will be the stage, on which the last grand conflict shall be decided, is highly probable: (Notes, 20:7—10. Ez. 38:9—23. Dan. 11:40—45.) but whether that country, or the papal dominions, be meant, by the thousand and six hundred furlongs, to be drenched with blood, must be left undecided. (Note, 14:14—20.) The dimensions may suit either one or the other: and it is not certain, whether particular dreadful judgments, on the immediate seat of the beast, or tremendous vengeance on all his remaining adherents, be there foretold.—It may be observed, by some readers, that I have not at all noticed the interpretations of those, who consider several of the vials as long since poured out. This has resulted from a full conviction, that these interpretations are absolutely inconsistent with the chronology of the prophecy, and the whole clue which must direct us in expounding it; and that they are altogether unsatisfactory, even as insulated accommodations. The opinion of those, who explain the former of the vials of recent events, which have occurred within these last twenty years, whether well grounded or not, may be allowed to be consistent with the chronology of the book, and with these vials, containing a prediction of "the last plagues." (Notes, 15:1—4.) The grand question to be decided, in this respect, relates to the sounding of the seventh trumpet. If that event be past, the vials have begun to be poured out; if it be future, none of them have been poured out. For it seems to me clear, that as the seventh seal includes all the seven trumpets; so the seventh trumpet includes all the seven vials. Nor do I think it possible for human sagacity to determine, till some considerable time has elapsed, at what precise period events of such immense magnitude, as those here predicted, began to be accomplished.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

How infatuated must men be, to set at defiance the power of God, who can fight against them by such varied means, and with such irresistible weapons! especially as he continues to beseech his enemies to be reconciled to him, and to share his omnipotent and everlasting favor! No wonder that angels, who witness or execute his vengeance on the implacable haters of God, of Christ, and of holiness, loudly celebrate the praises of his justice and truth; and adore his awful dispensations, when he brings upon bloody persecutors the tortures, which they had inflicted on his saints and prophets. But "the heart" of man is so "desperately wicked," that the most complicated miseries will never induce any one to repent, without the special preventing grace of God: nay, if men are left to themselves, they will "blaspheme the name of God," even in the intervals of "gnawing their tongues with pain!" It is vain, therefore, to expect that purgatory, or hell-fire, will ever bring men to glorify God in true repentance, or in any sense purge away their sins. Hell itself is filled with blasphemies, determined and horrid, in proportion to the degree of its torments: and they are as ignorant of the history of human nature, as of the Bible and of their own hearts, who do not know, that the more men suffer, and the more plainly they see the hand of God in their sufferings, the more furiously they often rage against him. Let then sinners now seek repentance from Christ, and the grace of the Holy Spirit; or they will hereafter have the anguish and horror of an unhumiliated, impenitent, and desperate heart, burning with enmity against God, as well as tortured by the fire of his indignation; and thus augmenting guilt and misery to all eternity.—While Satan and wicked men, by every artifice, and with all their power, excite numbers to combine against the cause of God; they are in fact gathered by him, that he may execute judgment upon them. (Notes, Ez. 38: 10, 16, 17. Joel 3: 9—17.) But many of those, who are professedly the friends of God, will have their portion with avowed unbelievers; and, being found destitute of the robes of righteousness and salvation, will walk naked, be put to shame, and perish. (Notes, Gen. 3: 7, 8.) May we then remember that Christ comes suddenly; that we may watch, and "give diligence to be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless." (Notes, 3: 1—3. Matt. 24: 42—44. Luke 12: 35—46. 1 Thes. 5: 1—3. 2 Pet. 3: 10—16.)

CHAP. XVII.

An angel shows John the persecuting idolatrous power which was to be destroyed; under the emblem of an infamous, but splendid harlot, riding on a scarlet-colored heat, with a golden cup in her hand, her name inscribed on her forehead, and drunk with the blood of the saints, 1—8. He explains the vision to him, 7—18.

AND there came <sup>a</sup> one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, and

2 With whom <sup>f</sup> the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication.

Note.—This chapter contains a digression from the main subject, and a kind of parenthesis in the course of the prophecy: to show more precisely what was meant by "great Babylon," the ruin of which had been so tremendously predicted. (Note, 16: 17—21.) One of the angels, who poured out the vials, conversed in vision with John; and called him to come to him, and he would show him the judgment of that antichristian power, secular and ecclesiastical, which might be emphatically called, "the great whore;" because it had exceeded all other churches, or societies and empires, in seducing men to commit idolatry, and abominations of every kind. "The many waters," on which this dignified harlot, who was illustrious in her infamy, sat enthroned as a queen, are afterwards explained. (Note, 15—18. Jer. 51: 13.) No one can doubt, but Rome is meant in this chapter; nay, the most zealous papists allow it: and indeed, it would not have been made so undeniable by being expressly named, as it is by this description. The only question then is, whether Rome Pagan, or Rome Papal is meant. But Pagan Rome never seduced the kings of the earth to join in her idolatries, she never intoxicated the inhabitants "with the wine of her fornication;" she subdued and ruled them with an iron rod, and not by artifices and blandishments; she left them in general to their ancient usages and worship; nay she imported the idols and vices of the conquered nations, and thus became fatally corrupted. Even when the Roman emperors persecuted the Christians, they did it rather from a desire of crushing innovations, which threatened, as they supposed, the peace of the state, connected with enmity against God, and truth, and holiness, than from zeal for any particular form of idolatry. On the other hand, it is well known, by what subtle insinuations, and politic management, "with all the deceivableness of unrighteousness," Rome Papal, without any adequate temporal force, has obtained and preserved an ascendancy over kings and nations; attaching them to her usurped dominion in blind submission, and inducing them to conform to her idolatries, and corruptions of Christianity. So that the authority of powerful kings, and the forces of mighty nations, have repeatedly been employed in defence of her tyranny: and multitudes have been intoxicated, and infuriated, by their zeal for that church, to murder their unoffending neighbors, by tens of thousands; and at the same time to enslave, weaken, and impoverish themselves! (Notes, 9—14. 14: 8. 18: 1—3. Jer. 51: 7.)

Note.—The angel then carried John, “in the Spirit,” (that is, being under the influence of the prophetic Spirit, he seemed to himself to be conveyed,) “into the wilderness;” for the antichristian tyranny and seductions had reduced the church into a most desolate state, and made it like a desert. (Notes, 12:13—17.) There he saw “a woman seated on a scarlet colored beast.” This “woman” was the emblem of the church of Rome, and “the beast” was the emblem of the temporal power, by which it has been supported; and the latter was “full of names of blasphemy,” which we have had repeated occasions to mention. (Notes, 12:3—6. 13:1—7. 2 Thes. 2:3,4.) “The seven heads and ten horns” are afterwards explained. (Notes, 7—14. 12:3—6. 13:1.) The woman was “arrayed in purple and scarlet-color;” for these have always been the distinguishing colors of popes and cardinals, as well as of the Roman emperors and senators: nay, by a kind of infatuation, the mules and horses on which they rode, have been covered with scarlet cloth; as if they were determined to answer this description, and even literally to ride on a scarlet-colored beast!—“The woman” was also most superbly decorated with gold and jewels: and who can, in adequate language, describe the pride, splendor, and magnificence of the church of Rome, in her vestments and ornaments of every kind? Even papists have gloried in the superiority of their church in this species of magnificence, above ancient Rome when at the height of her prosperity. This appears in all things relating to their public worship, and in the Papal court, even beyond what can be conceived: and external pomp attaches carnal men to a religion, which excessively interests and gratifies them, and may even be said to intoxicate them; whilst they despise the simplicity of spiritual worship.—“This is beyond description, and as much surpassed my expectation, as other sights have generally fallen short of it. Silver can scarce find an admittance; and gold itself looks but ‘poorly, among such an incredible number of ‘precious stones.’ Addison.—In the woman’s hand likewise there “was a golden cup full of abominations;” this alludes to the practice of harlots, in inflaming their paramours with love potions; and represents the various fascinating allurements, the impostures, delusions, promises of impunity, indulgences, absolutions, with hopes of worldly interest and preferment, by which that church has always obtained and preserved her influence; and seduced men to join in her spiritual fornication, the other abominations of her corrupt worship, and the unholiness connected with it. (Notes, 18:4—8. 19:1—6.)—To distinguish this notorious harlot from all others, her name was inscribed on her forehead; as prostitutes of old sometimes made themselves known, by labels on the forehead with their names upon them. This name was “Mystery, Babylon the Great.” Her religion was “a mystery of iniquity,” (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:5—7. 1 Tim. 3:16.) and she herself was mystically “Babylon the Great.”—Now there was nothing in Pagan Rome, to which this title was more proper, than to any other city; nor would it have been any thing very mysterious to have substituted one Pagan city for another: but it was indeed a “great mystery,” that the professed metropolis of the Christian church should be another Babylon, in idolatry, iniquity, and cruelty to the people of God: and her very title of ‘the Roman Catholic,’ or universal ‘church,’ entitles her to the name of “Mystery, Babylon the Great.” She affects indeed the character of ‘our holy mother the church;’ but she is in fact, “the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth;” the inventor, source, promoter, and principal example, of idolatries, and all kinds of abominable abuses and perversions of Christianity, with which the nations of the earth have been corrupted.—It is asserted by writers of good authority, that before the reformation, the word mystery was written in letters of gold, upon the front of the Pope’s mitre; but the fact has been controverted, and therefore, though the affirmative evidence vastly preponderates, we cannot be absolutely certain of it.

6 And I saw the woman * drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of <sup>y</sup> the martyrs of Jesus: and when I saw her, <sup>z</sup> I wondered with great admiration.

Note.—The woman was as notorious for cruelty and persecution, as for idolatry and profligacy; and the apostle saw her “drunken with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus.” (Notes, 16:3—7. 18:20. Dan. 7:19—27.) In this respect Rome Pagan and Rome Papal were both criminal; but the latter has probably slain more thousands, than the former did individuals: and the apostle would not have been greatly astonished to see a heathen city persecuting Christians, having witnessed and experienced such persecutions during many years, before he had this vision; but that a city, professedly Christian, and the metropolis of the Christian church, should thus wanton and riot in the blood of the saints, might well excite his highest amazement. ‘All this is very plain: but papists wonder by what figure of speech ‘heretics are called ‘saints,’ and rebels against ‘the Pope, ‘martyrs of Jesus.’” Bp. Hurd. (Note, John 16:1—3.)

7 And the angel said unto me, Wherefore didst thou marvel? <sup>a</sup> I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns.

8 The <sup>b</sup> beast that thou sawest was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and <sup>c</sup> go into perdition: and they that dwell on the earth <sup>d</sup> shall wonder, (<sup>e</sup> whose names were not written in the book of life <sup>f</sup> from the foundation of the world,) when they behold <sup>g</sup> the beast that was, and is not, and yet is.

Note.—Lest any one should mistake or hesitate concerning the meaning of these emblems, the angel became the interpreter of the vision. As the apostle had seen and heard very much on the same subject before, the angel inquired into the reason of his excessive amazement: (Notes, 12:3—6. 13:1—17.) and he then showed to him “the mystery of the woman, riding on the beast.” A beast is the emblem of an idolatrous and oppressive empire: the Roman empire was “the beast” under the Pagan emperors: it ceased to be so, when it became Christian, with reference to which the angel says, by way of anticipation, “It is not.” Yet it would afterwards “ascend out of the abyss:” that is, when the antichristian empire became idolatrous and persecuting, and the dragon gave his power to the beast, it seemed to arise out of the sea, the tempestuous state of the nations; but it was in fact from hell, being Satan’s grand scheme for opposing the gospel; (Notes, 9:1, 2. 11:7—12. 13:1—4.) and therefore after a time it would go into perdition, and be destroyed finally and forever.—The empire was idolatrous ‘under the heathen emperors; and then ceased ‘to be so under the Christian emperors; and ‘then became idolatrous again under the Roman ‘pontiffs; and hath so continued ever since.— ‘But in this last form it shall go into perdition: ‘it shall not, as it did before, cease for a time, ‘and revive again, but shall be destroyed for ‘ever.’ Bp. Newton. (Note, Dan. 7:9—14, 23—27. 11:44, 45.) In the mean while, however, it is foretold, it would deceive into a stupid admiration and blind submission, “all the inhabitants of the earth,” within the sphere of its influence, except the remnant of the elect. (Note, 13:8—10.)

Shall ascend. (8) Μελλει αναβαινεν. Is about to ascend. This determines the rise of the beast to a period subsequent to the prediction being delivered; and consequently Rome Pagan cannot be meant, for that had risen long before.

9 And <sup>h</sup> here is the mind which hath wisdom. <sup>i</sup> The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth.

10 And there are seven kings: five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a short space.

11 And the beast <sup>k</sup> that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition.

12 And <sup>l</sup> the ten horns which thou sawest, are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet; but receive power as kings one hour with the beast.

14 These <sup>o</sup> shall make war with the Lamb, and <sup>p</sup> the Lamb shall overcome them; for he is <sup>q</sup> Lord of lords, and King of kings: <sup>r</sup> and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful.

Note.—Here then was a proper trial and exercise of a man’s “wisdom,” to discover what was meant by the beast, which “had been, was not, and yet was;” being the same but in a different form. (Notes, 7:8. 13:18.)—To assist the reader in this inquiry, the angel observed, that “the seven heads” of this symbolical beast “are,” or represent, “seven mountains,” on which the woman was enthroned; being especially the seat of that ecclesiastical authority, by which the power of the beast is supported. (Notes, 13:1.) This is the well known situation of Rome: and though Constantinople is also built on seven hills, they are comparatively obscure, and no other mark of the beast answers to it. For “the seven heads” of the beast had another enigmatical meaning, and signified seven “kings,” or seven forms of government, or successions of rulers, according to the usual prophetic meaning of the word “kings.” They all appeared in vision at once upon the beast; but in fact five of them were fallen, at the time when the apostle had the vision; namely kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, and military tribunes; one of them then subsisted, even that of emperors; and another was not yet come, which when it came would endure only for a short time. Some explain this of the Christian emperors; but their power must either be included in the sixth head; or it could not be a head of the beast at all, not being idolatrous. Others explain it of the Exarch of Ravenna, the deputy of the emperor of the east, under which government this proud city, Rome, continued as a dukedom for above a hundred years. Others explain it of the usurpations of the Pope, before he became a temporal prince, or the prescribed “twelve hundred and sixty years” of the reign of the beast had entered: but that of the Exarch of Ravenna seems most clear. Many other interpretations have been given, and especially the dominion of Charlemagne and his successors, during several generations, has been fixed upon. In general, however, it related to the intervening space between the subversion of the empire, and the establishment of papal tyranny: during which time Rome was under the temporal jurisdiction of the Exarch of Ravenna, and the spiritual rule of the Pope; who had already introduced the worship of saints and images, and many other gross abuses. If this be reckoned a distinct form of government; then the beast, as it subsisted when the woman sat on it, was "the eighth," but if it is deemed too inconsiderable to be reckoned a distinct head, "He was one of the seven;" but whether the seventh or the eighth, he would be the last form of government in that idolatrous empire; and "goeth into perdition." The beast, therefore, "on which the woman rideth, is the Roman government in its last form: and this, all must acknowledge, is papal, not imperial." Bp. Newton. For the last head was the only one, which existed when the woman sat on the beast, and was therefore spoken of as the beast itself.—"The ten horns" (which seem to have all grown on the last head,) were "ten kings," or successions of kings; who had "received no kingdom" when John had this vision: but they would "receive power as kings one hour with the beast," or at the same time, and for the same period. This points out the division of the Roman empire into ten distinct kingdoms, yet all united in one design to support the idolatry of the church of Rome; and it is wholly incompatible with Pagan Rome. They might be kings; but they were not horns of the beast, till they embraced that religion, and both strengthened the hands of the pope and church of Rome, and were strengthened by them. These were contemporary, not successive princes, as the seven kings before mentioned were; and, notwithstanding the continual interference of their several political interests and measures, and their contests in other things, they were "of one mind to give their power to the beast:" implicitly submitting to that idolatrous religion; defending its tyranny and usurpations; enduring its exorbitant exactions; and obeying its mandates to make war, in opposing the cause of Christ, and in order to extirpate his disciples. But it was predicted, that they would all be finally defeated in that war, by "the Lamb of God;" as he is "Lord of lords, and King of kings," as many vain mortals have affected to call themselves: (Notes, 1 Kings 20: 1. Ezra 7:12. Dan. 2:37.) and his followers are effectually called to enlist under his standard, in consequence of his special choice of them; and therefore they are true believers, faithful to his cause, and to their own engagements. (Notes, 19:11—21. Matt. 22:11—14.)—Ten kings. (12. Notes, Dan. 2:40—45. 7: 7, 8.—King of kings. (14. Notes, Ps. 72:8—11. Prov. 8:15, 16. 1 Tim. 6:13—16.)

15 And he saith unto me, * The waters which thou sawest, where the whore sitteth, † are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues.

16 And " the ten horns which thou saw-est upon the beast, † these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate † and naked, and shall † eat her flesh, † and burn her with fire.

17 For † God hath † put in their hearts † to fulfil his will, and to agree and give their kingdom unto the beast, † until the words of God shall be fulfilled.

18 And † the woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth.

Note.—The angel next explained to the apostle "the many waters, on which the woman sat" in regal dignity. Four distinct words all in the plural number, aptly describe the extensive dominion of the church of Rome, not only over those within the territories belonging to the papacy, but over all the kingdoms of that communion: and in their remote dependencies, in the East Indies, in South America, and other places. Indeed the pope has claimed the right over all nations, to dispose of crowns, and depose princes, at his pleasure, as if he were "lord of lords, and king of kings!" and the very titles of 'universal bishop,' and 'the Roman catholic church,' fully accord to this description. This, however, will not always be the case; for the "ten horns," or kingdoms, which once exalted and supported the ecclesiastical tyranny, will at length "hate, desolate," strip, devour, and destroy it. Most of them will be the principal instruments in the destruction of popery, and the ruin of Rome itself; though some will lament over these events. (Note, 18:9, 10.)—How far some late revolutions may lead to this crisis, we cannot tell: but present appearances render it not improbable, that the last victory of the beast over the witnesses of Christ, will be obtained in some other way, than directly by papal delusions. Yet these appearances are continually changing.—(Note, 11:7—12.)—God had so influenced the hearts of these kings, by his power over them, and by the dispensations of his Providence; that they fulfilled his will, or did those things, without intending it, which he had purposed and predicted. (Notes, Ezra 1:1—4. Ps. 105:23—25. Ez. 14:9—11. 38:10. 2 Thes. 2:10—12.) Thus they had agreed together to "give their kingdom to the beast;" to make him, as it were, their liege lord; and to reign over others, only in order to render them subservient to him. But they will at length better understand their own interest, and their duty to God and their subjects, than thus any longer to prostitute their power.—To terminate the description of the woman, who sat on this symbolical beast, she was declared to be "that great city, which reigned over the kings of the earth," when John had this vision: and every body must know Rome to be that city. Indeed this was the avowed object, aim, and ambition of Rome, from its foundation; and, in different ways, it has accomplished its purpose, with little interruption, even to this present

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord takes pleasure in satisfying his people, concerning the reasons and equity of his judgments on his enemies; that they may not be intimidated by the severity of them, or fail to adore and praise him on that account.—Great prosperity, pomp, and splendor, commonly feed the pride and lusts of the human heart; yet they form no security against divine vengeance.—Those who allure or tempt others to sin, must expect more aggravated punishment, in proportion to the degree of the mischief done by them.—The worst abominations, idolatries, filthinesses, cruelties, and blasphemies, have been perpetrated within the professing church: and a magnificent religion, adorned with purple, and decked with gold and jewels, is generally antichristian. Indeed, every attempt to accommodate the truth or worship of God to the taste of carnal minds, must mar its simplicity, and corrupt its purity. But "the golden image," or "golden cup," in the hand of Babylon and her daughters, will reconcile most men to "the mysteries of iniquity" connected with it; and make them willingly swallow down the wine of their fornications; and even induce them to join in making themselves "drunken with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus." (Notes, Dan. 3:1—12.) Let all then beware of a splendid, a lucrative, or a fashionable religion; let us avoid "the mysteries of iniquity," and study diligently "the great Mystery of godliness;" that we may learn humility, simplicity, self-denial, and gratitude, in the stable at Bethlehem, in the carpenter's shop at Nazareth, by the side of the well at Sychar, in the garden of Gethsemane, and on mount Golgotha: for the more we resemble Christ, the less shall we be liable to be deceived by antichrist.—We cannot but "wonder" at the oceans, as it were, of Christian blood, which have been shed by men called Christians: but our wonder will abate, when we consider these prophecies; and the awful fact "will turn to us for a testimony" of the truth of the gospel. Whatever enemies at any time "make war against the Lamb" of God, they must surely be overcome by him. "Though hand join in hand" such wicked men "shall not be unpunished;" even if all the kings and nations of the earth should agree in opposing him: for he is "Lord of lords, and King of kings;" and his "called, chosen, and faithful" followers are always on the strongest side. May we approve ourselves to be of that number! And then we shall be "received to his glory," when wicked men will be destroyed in a most tremendous manner; and when their concurrence together in sin will be turned into the bitterest hatred and rage, and they will eagerly assist in tormenting each other. But "The LORD's Portion is his people;" "his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure;" and no counsel or machination of men or creatures can do more than fulfil his words, and that "purpose which he has purposed in himself," "to the praise of his glory," and to the everlasting felicity of all his chosen and faithful servants.

CHAP. XVIII.

A mighty angel announces the fall of Babylon, and its utter desolation, because of its abominations, 1—3. A voice from heaven calls on the people of God to come out of her, lest they should be involved in her destruction, 4—8. The kings and merchants connected with her lament her fall, 9—19; and the apostles and prophets are called to rejoice over it, 20. Her final and total overthrow first signified by a millstone cast into the sea; and then is emphatically described, 21—24.

AND after these things <sup>a</sup>I saw another angel come down from heaven, having great power; <sup>b</sup>and the earth was lightened with his glory.

3 For <sup>f</sup>all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and <sup>g</sup>the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the <sup>h</sup>abundance of <sup>i</sup>her delicacies.

Note.—(Note, 16:17—21.) After the apostle had been certified who "Babylon the Great" was, and what she had done, he had the vision of her destruction continued. "Another angel," distinct from those who "poured out the vials," came down from heaven, possessing great power, and illuminating the earth with his glory. This was either Christ himself, or an emblematical representation of his coming to destroy his enemies, and to diffuse the light of his gospel through all nations; to which events the language naturally directs our thoughts. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:8—12.) He therefore repeatedly proclaimed "with a strong voice," which all might hear, and which implied great power and authority, that "Babylon the Great is fallen," totally and finally. (Notes, 14:8. Is. 21:6—9.) It was become not only desolate, but a kind of hell upon earth. Some think, that the words may refer to the discoveries which will then be made, of the diabolical ambition, impostures, lies, murder, and horrible uncleanness, with which the city is filled, under the mask of religion; but the expressions are figurative and borrowed from the Old Testament. 9—17. Jer. 51:61—64.) It is most manifest, that no desolations have hitherto left Rome in this condition; unless any choose to say, that it “hath been the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird,” ever since popes and cardinals have made it their residence: for, unless this be admitted, it must be manifest to all men, that the prophecy is not yet fulfilled.—To the reasons before assigned for the ruin of this city, it is here added, that “the merchants of the earth are waxed rich, through the abundance of her delicacies.” Her outward magnificence, luxury, and excess, have proved a source of immense wealth to vast multitudes; and the various arts, trades, manufactures, and species of commerce, which flourish by means of her pompous religion, have always helped to support it: for “by that craft vast multitudes have their wealth.” Painting, sculpture, architecture, music, and all the fine arts, have also met with the most ample encouragement, and been cultivated, in the greatest perfection, in that splendid church. (Notes, 18:3—5. Acts 19:23—31. P. O. 21—31.) But the spiritual merchandise, by which unnumbered multitudes have wickedly lived in affluence, and enjoyed abundant delicacies, by the sins and follies of mankind, seem principally intended.

4 And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, <sup>i</sup> Come out of her, my people, that ye be not <sup>k</sup> partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues:

7 How <sup>q</sup> much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her; for she saith in her heart, <sup>r</sup> I sit a queen, and am <sup>s</sup> no widow, and shall see no sorrow.

8 Therefore <sup>t</sup> shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine, <sup>u</sup> and she shall be utterly burned with fire: <sup>v</sup> for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—As Lot was called forth out of Sodom, before it was destroyed by fire and brimstone; (Notes, Gen. 19:14—22,27—29.) so the people of God are directed by a voice from heaven, to come out of Babylon before her fall. (Notes, Is. 52:11,12. Jer. 50:7,8. 51:6,7,45,46.) This summons concerns all persons in every age. Those who believe in Christ, and “worship God in the Spirit,” should separate from so corrupt a church, and from all others which copy her example of idolatry, persecution, cruelty, and tyranny; and avoid “being partakers of her sins,” even if they have renounced her communion: or else they may expect to be involved in her plagues. (Note, 14:9—11.) Her crimes, her daring, presumptuous, and atrocious wickednesses, resembled mountains “reaching to heaven;” and “God had remembered her iniquities,” though his forbearance had been mistaken for disregard. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Notes, 16:17—21.) The persons therefore, or nations, who had been persecuted by her, were called on to retaliate upon her as a condemned criminal; and to give her a double measure of the wine of God’s wrath, from the cup of his indignation; according to the atrociousness of her sins, and the cruel treatment which they had received at her hands. Thus torture and anguish would be rendered to her, proportionable to her former ostentation, splendor and luxury; and to the pride and presumption, with which she had set these predictions at defiance, declaring that “she sat as a queen, was no” bereaved destitute “widow, and should see no sorrow,” whatever the word of God had threatened. (Notes, 20. 6:9—11. 14:8—11. 16:3—7. 19:1—6. Ps. 137:7—9. 149:7,9. Is. 14:1,2,12. 47:7—10. Jer. 51:9,10,34—37.) Therefore all the plagues which had been denounced against her would surely “come on her in one day,” suddenly and unexpectedly; death in every dreadful form would fill the city with mourning, and dire famine would attend the other desolations; till she should utterly be burned with fire; (Note, 17:15—18.) and then she would know that the Lord, who had judged and condemned her, was strong, and fully able to execute the tremendous sentence.—As Rome has never hitherto been “utterly burned with fire,” it is undeniable that events yet in futurity are predicted.—Be not partakers of her sins. (4) Notes, 1 Tim. 5:21,22. 2 John 7—11.—Double. (6) *Marg. Note.—Some of the kings, who had previously supported the church of Rome, will adhere to her, even when the rest of them will unite in destroying her; (Note, 17:15—18.) and they will lament her fall, having been bigoted to her idolatries, and having lived in more abundant and excessive luxury and magnificence, through their alliance with her. They will, therefore, bewail at a distance, beholding "the smoke of her burning" and torment, without being able to quench the one, or relieve the other: so that they must either at length renounce her, or share her doom. (Notes, 11—19. Ez. 28:16—23.) In this situation they will say, "Alas! alas!" Or, "Woe! woe!" for this will be the third woe before mentioned. (Note, 11:13,14.) Not that the fall of Rome will terminate that woe; (though it will en<sup>d</sup> with the pouring out of the seventh vial, and its immediate consequences;) for the events predicted in the following chapter will form a very considerable part of it. Nor is there any satisfactory proof, though it has generally been supposed, that the second woe-trumpet will end in the destruction of the Othman empire. (Note, 9:13—21.) On the contrary, it may perhaps subsist in an enfeebled state, till after the fall of the western antichrist. This may be one grand means of the national conversion of the Jews; and their restoration to their own land may produce the subversion of the Othman empire, the destruction of the Moham- medan delusion, and the calling of the other Gentiles. (Notes, Ez. 38: 39: Dan. 11:40—45.)—We ought not indeed to be confident in such matters; yet the arrangement of this and the two following chapters, seems to favor the supposition: as the destruction of all Christ's implacable enemies, the conversion of the nations, and the binding of Satan, are predicted in order, after the fall of Rome. (Notes, 19: 20:1—3.)

19 And <sup>w</sup> they cast dust on their heads, and cried, <sup>x</sup> weeping and wailing, saying, Alas, alas, that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea, by reason of her costliness! for in one hour is she made desolate.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—(Notes, 17:3—5. Ez. 26: 27:12—25.) This lamentation of these "merchants," over Rome, coincides in many respects with that of the merchants over Tyre. The various articles of commerce here enumerated do not require a particular consideration: the whole is calculated to convey, in the most impressive manner imaginable, some idea of the splendor, luxury, excess, and self-indulgence of all kinds, which have so long triumphed in the powerful, magnificent, elegant, luxurious, and licentious metropolis of popery; and which have always enriched a vast number of individuals, in different ways, by impoverishing the nations belonging to that communion. Neither is it requisite to accommodate the various particulars, to the several kinds of spiritual merchandise, by which the popes, cardinals, bishops, abbots, priests, and other retainers, have been enriched, at the expense of the people. These are indeed evidently alluded to; when not only "slaves," but "the souls of men," are mentioned as articles of commerce; which is, beyond comparison, the most infamous of all traffics that the demon of avarice ever devised; even almost infinitely more atrocious, than the infamous slave-trade. Yet alas, it is very far from uncommon. The sale of indulgences, dispensations, absolutions, masses, and bulls, has always enriched the Romish clergy and their dependents, to the deceiving and destroying of the souls of millions; and thus "by feigned words, they made merchandise of them;" nor has the management of church-preferments, and many other things, been any better than trafficking in souls; and it would be highly gratifying to protestants, if we could say, that this merchandise has been peculiar to the Roman antichrist, and exclusively their guilt; and that none among us were "partakers of their sins." (Note, Is. 56:9—12. P. O. 9—12. Note, Matt. 21:12,13. P. O. 12—16.) In general, however, all this will at length come to nothing, and no man will "buy the merchandise" of Rome any more: but all who have shared the gains of her commerce, temporal or spiritual, will stand afar off, for fear of her torment, and "behold the smoke of her burning," as that of Sodom was seen at a distance. (Gen. 19:28. Notes, Deut. 29:20—25. Is. 34:9—15. Dan. 7:9,14.)—Probably, the destruction of Rome will be finished by some immediate judgment of God; and the nature of the soil in the vicinity, the frequent eruptions of subterraneous fires, and terrible earthquakes, which have often occurred, seem to point out the method: the combustibles are provided, and the train is already laid; there only wants the "breath of the Almighty to kindle it." (Note, Is. 30:33.)

Note.—While united numbers, whose hopes of further gains will be gone, or whose vain confidence in superstition and idolatry will be ruined, shall lament most dolefully, and with anguish and trembling of heart, over the fall of Rome; the inhabitants of "heaven," and especially the "holy apostles and prophets," are called on to rejoice over it: as God had "avenged them" on that idolatrous persecuting city; as well as made way for the preaching of his gospel to all nations. (Notes, 6:9—11. 12:7—12. 16:4—7.)—It is peculiarly worthy of observation, that "the apostles," who are idolatrously honored at Rome, and daily worshipped, should be especially mentioned as rejoicing in her fall; as if it "avenged them" on her, for the dishonor cast on their characters, while it vindicated the glory of God. (Note, 13:5—7.)—There could be no reason why Christians should rejoice in the judgments inflicted on ancient Rome, by the Huns, Goths, Vandals, and other idolatrous nations; for the Christians were peculiarly sufferers in those calamities. The judgments on papal Rome must therefore be exclusively intended.

21 And a mighty angel took up a stone like a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, <sup>c</sup> Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down, <sup>d</sup> and shall be found no more at all.

22 And <sup>e</sup> the voice of harpers and musicians, and of pipers, and trumpeters, shall be heard no more at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatsoever craft he be, shall be found any more in thee; and the sound of a millstone shall be heard no more at all in thee;

23 And <sup>f</sup> the light of a candle shall shine no more at all in thee; <sup>g</sup> and the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride shall be heard no more at all in thee: for <sup>h</sup> thy merchants were the great men of the earth; <sup>i</sup> for by thy sorceries were all nations deceived.

24 And <sup>k</sup> in her was found the blood of prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth.

Note.—As a stone was tied to a book, and cast into the Euphrates, by Seraiah, in token of literal Babylon's fall; (Note, Jer. 51:61—64.) so "a mighty angel" here cast a large millstone into the sea, to represent the violence of mystical Babylon's fall, and to show that she would never rise again. This event is further illustrated by varied emphatical expressions taken from the ancient prophets. (Notes, Is. 34:8—15. Jer. 25:10. 33:10,11. Marg. Ref. e—g.)—"But Rome is still standing, and flourishing, and is honored by many nations, as the 'metropolis of the Christian world; she still resounds with singers and musicians; she still 'excels in arts, which serve to pomp and luxury: she still abounds with candles, and lumps, and torches, burning even by day, as well as 'by night; and consequently this prophecy hath 'not been, but remains yet to be fulfilled.' Bp. Newton. Her merchants being said to be "the great men of the earth," in connexion with "all nations being deceived by her sorceries," plainly refers to the infamous traffic before mentioned.

No more at all. (21) Ουκετι. 11. Ουκετι η ηη, 14. Ου μη ηη, 22, 23. These repeated, varied, and emphatical negatives should not pass unnoticed. (Notes, Is. 13:18—22. 14:21—23.) Of what other city, literal Babylon alone excepted, is such decisive language used, concerning its absolute and final destruction?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

When collective bodies are ripe for vengeance, their sins will be punished in this world; but individuals are reserved unto "the wrath to come."—Impunity and prosperity in wickedness, constitute the most fatal incentive to further crimes; and, as the day of punishment will arrive, they may be accounted the most dire calamities.—When the Lord shall come in his great power, to "lighten the earth with his glory;" he will cast down the proudest cities, which are filled with iniquity and oppose his cause. The magnificence of wicked kings and emperors, or the riches of ungodly merchants, will then alike avail nothing; except to augment, and render more intolerable, the vengeance to be inflicted: and surely even the contempt and torment of hell must be more dreadful to those who "have glorified themselves and lived deliciously," than to other sinners!

V. 9—19.

No allies or helpers can deliver those, against whom the Lord God, as a strong Judge and Avenger, is pleased to contend: they can only lament the victims of his indignation, and tremble for themselves. (Note, Num. 16:28—34.) The prosperous merchants and traders, in great commercial cities, should learn from these prophecies, "to buy the truth," "to get wisdom," and "with all their getting to get understanding;" to "sell all, and purchase the Pearl of great price;" to ensure "the unsearchable riches of Christ;" and to be "faithful stewards in the unrighteous mammon;" (Notes, Luke 16:1—13.) otherwise, even in this life, they may lament, that "no man buyeth their merchandise any more," as recent events most fully show; and that "all the fruits that their souls lusted after are departed from them." Death however will soon terminate their commerce, and in that "one hour" all the riches of the ungodly will come to nought, and all "their purple and fine linen," will be exchanged, not only for the coffin and the worm, but for "the fire that never shall be quenched." (Notes, Luke 16:19—31.)—Alas! too often, injustice, oppression, fraud, avarice, or excessive indulgence, are connected with extensive commerce: and to number "the persons of men," with oxen, asses, sheep, and horses, as the stock of a farm, or with bales of goods, as the cargo of a ship, is no doubt a most detestable and antichristian practice, fit only for "Babylon the Great." Yet even this, cruel, unrighteous, and hateful as it is, must not be considered as the worst traffic, even of this our land: for the souls of men are traded for by those, who take the cure of them for the sake of the emolument, and the abundance of the delicacies obtained by it; and then either leave them to perish in ignorance, or poison them by heresy, or lead them on the road to hell by a profligate example: strenuously, and by every calumny, if stronger means are withheld, opposing all, who attempt to prevent the dire effects of their vile conduct. How fervently should we then pray, that God would illuminate all bishops, 'priests, and deacons, with the true knowledge 'and understanding of his word,' and raise up rulers and reformers, who may contend as firmly, perseveringly, and successfully, against this vile merchandise, as some truly honorable and philanthropical persons have done against the accursed slave-trade! For when Christ shall again come to "drive the buyers and sellers out of the temple," he will have much to do, in various other places besides Rome. Many of these spiritual wickednesses, and this merchandise of souls, by feigned words, equivocating subscriptions and declarations, nay, worshipping God in expressions, which are avowedly deemed false by those who use them, and all this "for filthy lucre's sake," will be found, under different forms, even in the protestant churches: and perhaps no denomination is quite free from the guilt of rendering religious profession, and sacred functions, subservient to worldly interest, credit, ease, and indulgence. These are the remains of the antichristianity derived from Rome, which most need protesting against and removing; in these things we ought to "come out and separate from Babylon," if we would not partake of her plagues. Compared with such evils, a posture, a garb, or a ceremony, though perhaps inconvenient in itself, and derived from Rome, is scarcely worth noticing: yet bigotry exerts itself principally the other way; and externals are decried against with great warmth, while the spiritual pride, avarice, worldly indulgence, and intolerance of Rome are not so much disliked! But the vengeance of heaven is coming upon Rome, not for gestures, garbs, and ceremonies, though multiplied, ridiculous, and of bad consequence in themselves; but for idolatry, ambition, oppression, cruelty to the people of God; imposture, avarice, licentiousness, and spiritual tyranny. These are the sins, which have "reached to the heavens," the iniquities that God remembers; and the evils, for which we must stand aloof from her communion, and that of all others, who resemble her, or we shall be involved in their destruction. But we must needs go out of the world, and the church too, if we renounce every religious society, because some of the members or leaders of it are criminals in such matters.

When the world rejoices, the disciples of Christ often mourn; but they are called to "rejoice" when the world is filled with lamentation. (Note, John 16:16—22.) It is of comparatively little consequence, what becomes of all the riches, magnificence, and costliness of the earth; if the Redeemer's kingdom be but promoted, and his enemies either converted, or deprived of the power to do mischief. "Apostles and prophets rejoice in heaven" on such occasions, and we ought to rejoice on earth; even though they be connected with the fall of mighty cities and empires, to "rise no more for ever." But let sinners take warning by the judgments executed on others, to tremble and "flee from the wrath to come," and to stand at a distance from those things, which have brought others to destruction: (Note, 1 Tim. 6:6—10.) and let us all take occasion, from the view given us of the changeable nature of earthly things, to "set our affections on things above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God." (Note, Col. 3:1—4.)

CHAP. XIX.

The apostle hears in vision all the servants of God praise him with loud acclamations, 1—6. An intimation is given of the vast success of the gospel, under the emblem of the marriage of the Lamb, 7, 8. An angel declares the blessedness of those, who are called to the marriage supper, 9. John about to worship the angel, is reproved, and forbidden, 10. Christ and his followers, on white horses, are seen obtaining great and decisive victories, and utterly destroying all opposers, especially the beast and the false prophet and their adherents, who are cast alive into a lake of fire and brimstone, 11—21.

6 And I heard, as it were, the voice of a great multitude, <sup>q</sup> and as the voice of many waters, <sup>r</sup> and as the voice of mighty thunders, saying, Alleluia: <sup>s</sup> for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.

Note.—When the apostle had witnessed the destruction of mystical Babylon, (Notes, 18:20—24.) he heard “the loud voice of much people in heaven,” singing the praises of God in exalted strains; ascribing to him their own salvation and that of his church; and adoring his glorious perfections, as displayed in these events and in all his wonderful works, and his sovereign and everlasting dominion. (Note, 7:9—12.) For his truth and justice had been made alike conspicuous, in the judgments which had been executed on that corrupt and persecuting church and city. (Notes, 15:1—4. 16:3<sup>e</sup>—7.) And again they cried Alleluia, or “Praise the LORD;” while the smoke of the city arose up perpetually, and was an emblem of the final and eternal misery of the wicked inhabitants, who had been cut off in their sins. (Note, 14:9—11.) In these praises, the emblematical representatives of the church, and her ministers, most cordially united: (Note, 4:4—8.) and a voice from the throne of God, or from some one who was very near it, called on all the servants of God in heaven and earth, great and small, even all his worshippers, all who feared God, without distinction, to praise him. (Notes, Ps. 118:1—4. 135:15—24.) This was followed by the acclamations of a multitude, like the rushing of a cataract, or the roaring of the sea, nay, of mighty thunders; who joined in praising the Lord, because by his omnipotence he had taken the throne, and would reign in and by his Son all over the earth. (Notes, 5:8—14. 11:15—18. 14:1—5. Ps. 96:97:1. 98:)—The repeated use of the word “Alleluia,” or, Hallelujah, which is Hebrew, (Notes, Ps. 106:1. 149:1) is supposed by some persons to be an intimation that the Jews will be converted about the time of the destruction of Rome: and, whatever may be thought of this, it is exceedingly probable that the accomplishment of the New Testament prophecies, in this respect, will be one principal means of effecting that happy change, if it have not previously taken place.

should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and * white: for <sup>y</sup> the fine linen is the righteousness of saints.

Note.—The whole company, before mentioned, next call on one another, “to rejoice, and give glory to” the Lord; “because the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready.” Christ is the Bridegroom of his ransomed church: this sacred union will be fully completed in heaven; but the beginning of the glorious Millennium may be considered as a remarkable celebration of his espousals on earth. (Notes, 21:1—4,9—21. Ps. 45:9—17. Cant. 1:2. 3:11. John 3:27—36. 2 Cor. 11:1—6. Eph. 5:22—27.) All that has hitherto been done seems to be merely an introduction to that happy Era; when innumerable multitudes will be converted all over the earth, and the state of the church will greatly resemble heaven itself. Then “the marriage of the Lamb” will come; and his espoused church, being purified from heresies, divisions, and antichristian corruptions, in doctrine, discipline, worship, and practice, will be “made ready,” and meet to be publicly owned by him, as his delight and his beloved. Then to her it will be granted to “be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white,” or pure and shining, “which is the righteousness of the saints.” The word is plural, and some would render it, “the righteous acts of the saints;” but the word raiment, in this meaning, seems generally to signify, either the righteousness of Christ imputed to them, or the image of Christ renewed in them, by the sanctification of the Spirit, of which their righteous acts are effects and evidences; and indeed both senses may here be intended. (Notes, 7:13—17. Rom. 13:11—14. Gal. 3:26—29.)—That is, those good works, which are the certain evidences of a living faith. Beza.

Righteousness. (8) Αἰσιωματα. Luke 1:6. Rom. 5:16,18. 8:4.

10 And <sup>c</sup> I fell at his feet to worship him. And he said unto me, <sup>d</sup> See thou do it not: <sup>e</sup> I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren that have <sup>f</sup> the testimony of Jesus: <sup>g</sup> worship God: <sup>h</sup> for the testimony of Jesus is the Spirit of prophecy.

the marriage-supper of the Lamb." (Notes, Matt. 22:1—14. Luke 14:15—24.) This seems especially to refer to the more abundant grace and consolation, that Christians will receive in those happy days which are coming. This will render their lives on earth far more blessed than ours are at present, and make them meet for a more exalted felicity in heaven.—The church collectively is the spouse of Christ: believers are often individually spoken of as invited guests to the marriage-feast, which may relate both to their present joy in the Lord, and to the perfect happiness of heaven. The angel further assured John, that "these were the true sayings of God;" thus attesting the whole of the prophecies and promises. Upon which the glorious presence of the angel, and the rapturous prospect of the approaching happy times, threw the apostle's mind into such an agitation, that he fell prostrate before the angel to "worship him." But the angel charged him by no means to do it: as he was not his Creator, or Lord, or in any respect an object of adoration; but a fellow-servant to him, and to his brethren who had been employed to bear testimony to the Lord Jesus. And he ought to "worship God," and not a creature and a servant: for he (the angel) was only a prophet of superior order, being inspired by the Spirit to bear testimony to Jesus, as the common Lord of men and angels. Indeed, "the testimony of Jesus" was, from the beginning, the great subject of "the Spirit of prophecy;" to whomsoever he was given; as also the revelations and predictions of scripture were intended to make the Saviour known, in his personal and mediatorial glory, to make way for his coming, to announce it, to lead the attention of men to him, or to prove the doctrines revealed concerning him.—"Thither, as to that one and certain 'scope, or object, all the prophecies tend: 'whence it is effected, that, at last, the true 'Spirit of prophecy, to which we must hearken, 'is that which leads us unto Jesus.' Beza. (Notes, Luke 24:25—35, 44—49. John 5:39—47. 16:14,15.)—Christ never declined such honor, as John was forbidden to render to the angel, nay, he always showed his approbation of it: but the angel was a servant, and no more: Jesus is "the King of Glory," and "the Lord of all," "God blessed for evermore." (Notes, 22:8,9. Matt. 14:33. 15:25—28. Acts 10:24—26.)—It should also especially be remembered, that the worship of creatures, or demons, under the names of saints and angels, forms the most prominent part of that corruption of Christianity by idolatry, which has extended its baleful influence through so many populous nations, and continued during so many revolving ages; and against which the apostle was, in this book, required to bear a most decided prophetic testimony. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) Now, nothing could give more energy to this protest, than the repeated injunction laid on him, not to pay any homage at all resembling adoration, to a most glorious benevolent angel, when visibly present, and acting the part of an instructor to him. Surely then, no invisible, and (as far as we can know) absent creatures, can be worshipped, without giving to them the glory which belongs exclusively to JEHOVAH. (Note, Ex. 20:3.)

Note.—Having noted the rejoicing of the universal church, and of "all the servants of God," over the destruction of Rome; the apostle "saw heaven opened," as an indication of further visions: and he beheld "a white horse," the emblem of justice and holiness; and One sat on it, who was "called Faithful and True," fulfilling his promises to his people, and executing threatened vengeance on his enemies. (Note, 6:1,2.) He was indeed about to "judge, and to wage war" against, those who refused submission to him; yet he was unlike those warriors, whose ambition, rapacity, or malignant passions, have in every age made the earth "a field of blood;" for he conducted both his judicial proceedings, and his military expeditions, by the most perfect rules of righteousness. (Notes, Ps. 45:6,7. Heb. 7:1—3.) Yet none could deceive him, or elude his detection, for "his eyes were as a flame of fire." (1:14.)—The "many crowns" worn by him denoted the extent of his authority, as Creator of the world, and "Head over all things to his church;" and the multitude of his victories. "He had a name written that no man knew but himself;" for, as the eternal Son of God, his perfections and nature are incomprehensible (Notes, 2:17. Jude. 13:18—22. Is. 9:6,7.

Matt. 11:27.) His "vesture, dipped in blood," implied, either the atonement of his own blood, as the ground of his mediatorial authority; or rather, that he was come from the slaughter of his enemies, and had stained his garments with their blood. (Notes, Is. 63:1-6.) But, though none could fully comprehend his perfections and counsels; yet he was known in his church by the name of "the Word of God," as declaring the mysterious perfections, and holy truth and will of God to fallen men. (Note, John 1:1-3.) He was also followed by "the armies of heaven," even his redeemed and converted people, who rode on "white horses," to denote their conformity to him, and their concurrence and agency in his victories. (Note, Gen. 3:14, 15.) These were "clothed in fine linen," (Note, 7,8.) as accepted in him, and renewed by him. To illustrate the nature of his conquests still more fully, "out of his mouth went a sharp sword," (1:16. Notes, Is. 11:2-5. Heb. 4:12,13.) implying that he powerfully executed the denunciations of his word, and smote the opposing nations. (Notes, 2:24-28. Ps. 2:7-12.) Thus "he trode the wine-press of the wrath of God;" (Note, 14:14-20.) crushing all other obstinate enemies, as he had done the mystical Babylon. He had also inscribed "on his vesture, and on his thigh," (the part of his garments where the sword is worn) another name or title, implying his universal and absolute dominion, as "KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS;" (Note, 17:9-14.) This carried in it a warning to the most powerful princes to submit to him, or they must fall before him.—These verses and the context seem to predict the progress of the gospel, subsequent to the fall of Rome, in the destruction of the remains of the antichristian empire, the purifying of the visible church, the conversion of Jews and complete restoration of Israel, the termination of Mohanmedism, and the bringing in of the fulness of the Gentiles: and they more fully declare most important transactions, which had been before intimated, and which had been also foretold by the ancient prophets. (Notes, Ps. 149: Is. 11:11-16. 12: 34: 49:24-26. 51:21-23. 60: 63:1-6. 66:15-24. Ez. 38: 39: Dan. 2:44,45. 7:9-14. 8:23-25. 11:40-45. Hos. 3:4,5. Joel 3:9-21. Am. 9: 13-15. Ob. 17-21. Mic. 5:7-15. 7:3-17. Zeph. 3:14-17. Zech. 12:6-14. 14:)

18 That <sup>e</sup> ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses, and of them that sit on them, and the flesh <sup>f</sup> of all men, both free and bond, both small and great.

Note.—The "angel standing in the sun" emblematically denoted, that the predicted judgments would be rendered conspicuous to all the world; and his proclamation showed the immense slaughter which would be made of the enemies of God. To this place may be referred Ezekiel's prophecy of Gog and Magog; as the subsequent visions seem to relate to the Millennium: (Notes, 20:7-10. Ez. 38:—48:.) for the total ruin of the eastern antichrist, and of all the opposers of the gospel in Asia and elsewhere, seems to be intimately connected with the fall of the western antichrist.—Though Rome "the seat of the beast" was destroyed, yet "the beast" himself is supposed still to subsist: for the spirit of antichrist will survive that antichristian city. Probably the adherents of the party will unite with other enemies of genuine Christianity, in different parts of the world: and "the woman," who was the emblem of Rome, which was to be destroyed, was not "the beast;" but "sat upon the beast." (Notes, 13:1-10. 17:3-8,15-18.) "The beast," or the idolatrous persecuting power, whose chief seat had been at Rome, will form a confederacy with "the kings of the earth," that, with combined forces, they may fight against Christ and his servants: but, in the event, the antichristian tyranny, and the corrupt clergy, who deceived men by lying miracles to support it, will be seized on and dreadfully destroyed; by being "cast alive into the lake of fire burning with brimstone;" and then all the remnant of their adherents will be cut off, according to the words of Christ; so that all opposition to his pure religion will then cease, till after the Millennium.—"The false prophet" evidently denotes the same power, before designated as "the two horned beast;" and this effectually confirms the interpretation which has been given of that great enemy of God and his church. God, whenever he executes his "true and righteous judgments" on those who corrupt the earth with pernicious principles and ungodly practices, and when he avenges the blood of his servants upon their persecutors. (Notes, Judg. 5:30,31. Ps. 68:1—3. 149:7—9.) Though "the smoke of their torment shall arise up for ever and ever;" the whole company of redeemed sinners, and all the servants and worshippers of God in heaven and earth, will concur in these acclamations, and say, Amen, Hallelujah. Who then are they, that throw out insinuations or openly speak of cruelty and tyranny, on hearing of these "righteous judgments," but rebels, who blasphemously take part with the enemies of God, and plead against his dealings towards them? Let all beware of every approach to such impiety and presumption; for "the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."—As "justice and judgment are the basis of his throne," the earth has cause to tremble; but, as it is established in mercy also, the penitent may rejoice in hope. (Notes, Ps. 97:1—7. 99:1—3.) Ten thousand times ten thousand, who once were rebels, are now singing, "Salvation, and glory, and honor, and power, be unto the Lord our God." Let us then be glad in him, and give honor to him; and, while we view "the Lamb that was slain," espousing redeemed sinners unto himself; let us remember that we are invited to share the blessedness of "the marriage-supper;" that "the wedding-garment" is given to all who properly seek for it; that now is the time to be made ready for those sacred joys; and that all the felicity, which the world can boast, is not worthy to be compared with this unfading crown of glory and happiness. "These are the true sayings of God:" let none then say, "I pray thee have me excused."—If created angels are so glorious, as to surprise even the aged apostle into a purposed adoration; how glorious must the Lord of angels be! And if the highest of holy creatures greatly fear, and decidedly refuse, undue honor, how humbly should we sinful worms of the earth behave ourselves! And yet we may and ought to aspire at being made "equal to angels, and the children of God," by faith in Christ Jesus. We should then beware of a voluntary humility; and not degrade ourselves, or dishonor our Head, by worshipping angels, or any mere creature; by "calling men masters upon earth," or by the grovelling pursuit of worldly things. (Note, Col. 2:18,19.)—But the Blessed Jesus is "the Lord of all," while angels, apostles, and Christians are fellow-servants: he is "God over all," and therefore to be worshipped, as one with the Father and the Holy Spirit; and all Revelation is "the testimony" of the Father, by the Spirit, to the Redeemer's personal and mediatorial glory: the whole centres in him, and in his salvation and kingdom.

V. 11—21.

We ought continually to pray, that "the King of kings, and Lord of lords," whose "name is Wonderful," may speedily go forth, in faithfulness and righteousness, to extend his spiritual conquests; till "all kings fall down before him, and all nations do him service!" May his armies be increased in number, and made more like unto him; being "clothed in fine linen, clean and white," which "is the righteousness of saints!"—We cannot indeed know his whole glory, or his immeasurable love; but let us endeavor to be more acquainted with him, as THE WORD OF GOD; and, accepting of his Salvation, may we be glad in him, who is "the King of kings, and Lord of lords!" for he will surely smite his proudest and stoutest enemies "with the rod of his mouth," and "with the breath of his lips will he slay the wicked;" till he has crushed them all "in the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of almighty God." It behoves us then to rejoice, and praise the Lord, when opposing tyrants are crushed, and false prophets are put to silence in darkness; and we should not scruple to add, "So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord." Nevertheless, it is our part to aim at more peaceful and gentle victories; and, by our prayers, example, and improvement of talents, to seek the conversion of sinners, and the salvation of the souls even of our most cruel enemies and persecutors; while we constantly declare, that "except they repent, they will all likewise perish."

CHAP. XX.

An angel binds Satan, and imprisons him in the abyss, for a thousand years, 1—3. The glorious state of the church during that period is figuratively described, 4—6. Satan, being loosed, again deceives the nations, and excites terrible war against the church, 7—9; the assailants are destroyed by fire from heaven, and Satan cast into hell, 10. Christ appears to raise the dead, and to judge the world; with the condemnation, and punishment "in the lake of fire," of all, who are not "written in the book of life," 11—15.

2 And <sup>d</sup> he laid hold on <sup>e</sup> the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years,

3 And <sup>f</sup> cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, <sup>g</sup> and set a seal upon him, that he <sup>h</sup> should deceive the nations no more, till <sup>i</sup> the thousand years should be fulfilled: <sup>k</sup> and after that he must be loosed a little season.

Note.—In the foregoing chapter the termination of all open opposition to the gospel, and the dreadful punishment of all those, who had introduced, supported, or concurred in the idolatrous corruptions before described, are most clearly predicted. But, while the instruments of mischief had been cut off, the great agent was still at liberty; and he would surely excite fresh disturbances, or produce new delusions, if not prevented. The apostle had therefore a vision, emblematical of the restraints which would be laid on Satan himself. An angel from heaven, with "the key of the abyss," (Note, 9:1,2.) "and a great chain," seized on him, bound him, and "cast him into the abyss," and there "shut him up, and set a seal upon him;" (Note, Matt. 27:62—66.) to prevent his deceiving the nations, as he had before done: and this imprisonment continued during one thousand years. (Note, 4—6.) In some places, “the dragon” signifies the persecuting power of idolatrous emperors, who were vicegerents of the devil, and bare his name and style: (Notes, 12:3—6. 13:1—4.) but here Satan himself is evidently meant. And it is implied that Christ, with omnipotence and absolute authority, will restrain “the devil and his angels,” even all his legions of evil spirits, from deceiving mankind in general, or any part of them, into idolatry, impiety, heresy, and wickedness, as he has hitherto done. (Notes, 7—10. 12:7—17.) For though human nature is prone to all evil, and averse to all good; yet the agency and influence of fallen angels have immense effect in counteracting the gospel, in exciting men to atrocious crimes and cruel persecutions, and in devising and propagating ingenious, but fatal, delusions. (Notes, 2 Cor. 11:13—15. 2 The. 2:8—12.) When, therefore, this “roaring lion,” or subtle poisonous old serpent, shall be completely restrained; the gospel will be rendered effectual, to purify the church and convert the nations; the Christian religion in all its purity and glory will become universal; and the true “Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit.” Then the first petitions of the Lord’s prayer will be wonderfully answered; (Notes, Matt. 6:9,10.) and piety, peace, righteousness, and purity will fill the earth, till Satan shall again for a short space be loosed. (Marg. Ref. d—h.—Note, Gen. 3:14,15.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle next saw “thrones, and those that sat upon them.” These persons, sitting on thrones, represented the honorable and prosperous state of believers in those happy days; for they appeared to reign as kings on the earth. (Marg. Ref. l.—Notes, 1:4—6. 4:4,5. 5:8—10. Dan. 7:23—27.) “And judgment was given to them:” they were Christ’s assessors, as it were, in the judgment executed on “the beast, the false prophet,” and “the devil;” even as all believers will be, when he shall judge the world. (Notes, 3:20—22. Luke 22:28—30. 1 Cor. 6:1—6.)—And he “saw the souls” of the martyrs, confessors, and other eminent Christians of the preceding periods, “who lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years.”—It has long been contended, and by disputants of various descriptions, whether this prophecy should be understood literally, or figuratively: and when prophecies are evidently unfulfilled, modesty and caution are peculiarly requisite. Yet it is necessary here to give an opinion, with the reasons on which it is formed. I am therefore induced to understand it figuratively, by the following considerations: 1st. The whole book is enigmatical, and full of emblems: so that a literal exposition would often imply absurdity: and the interpreter’s business and skill consist principally in explaining emblems, or hieroglyphics. A succession of kings is constantly spoken of, as if they were individually the same persons: the two witnesses who were slain, were “raised again, and ascended into heaven;” when others were sent forth of the same spirit, and to bear the same testimony with greater encouragement and success. (Notes, 11:3—14.) Rome is called Egypt, Sodom, Jerusalem, Babylon; and, in short, this is the style and manner of the whole prophecy, which no man could possibly explain on any other principle. As therefore the Jews expected Elijah to come personally, and knew him not when he came mystically, in John the Baptist; (Notes, Matt. 17:10—13. Luke 1:11—17.) so, I apprehend, many Christians, and men of the utmost respectability for piety and learning, have fallen into the same mistake, in expecting a literal and personal resurrection of the martyrs, at the opening of the Millennium; and they would not know them at first, when they arose, (as the witnesses did,) in a numerous race of Christians, resembling them in all their most eminent graces. 2dly. It is unaccountable, that “the souls” of the persons raised should be exclusively mentioned, if the literal resurrection of their bodies was meant: for this rather implies, according to the enigmatical style of the book, that their souls re-animated other bodies; that is, they appeared to live again, in Christians of the same spirit. (Note, 6:9—11.) 3dly. Some have imagined, that the resurrection of all the righteous will precede the Millennium; because “the dead in Christ will rise first.” (Note, 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) But what do they suppose the state of the earth will be during that period? Will no inhabitants dwell on earth except the risen saints? Or will all the other inhabitants be wicked? Or, being righteous, will they not die? Or, if they die, will there be three resurrections; one, of the righteous before the Millennium, and another of the righteous after it, and one of the wicked? These questions are not easily resolved on that hypothesis: yet, till they are satisfactorily resolved, the sentiment is wholly inadmissible. The resurrection is always spoken of, as one grand event, occurring nearly at the same time; except, that the righteous will be first raised, and so be prepared to sit with Christ in judgment on the wicked: and it is implied in every one of those declarations, that all the dead in Christ will rise together, before the living shall be changed. (Notes, John 5:28,29. 1 Cor. 15:20—28. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) 4thly. We cannot conceive, that it could add to the felicity of those, who, being “absent from the body, are present with the Lord,” (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—8. Phil. 1:21—26.) to come again to dwell on the earth; which must be in some degree a scene of pain, suffering, imperfection, and death, till the present state of things is fully ended; and this will not be till the general resurrection; as it sufficiently appears from the loosing of Satan, and the effects of it, after the Millennium. (Note, 7—10.) 5thly. This is the only place, in which any thing like such a literal resurrection, previous to the end of the world, is intimated; whereas there are numerous prophecies of an universal prevalence and triumph of true religion throughout the earth. Now is it most reasonable, to interpret so many plain predictions by one expression in this enigmatical book; or to explain that one expression by the many clear predictions, which give another view of it? Or why should the literal sense be here insisted on, when in so many places it must, in that case, be departed from? But, why speak of the literal sense? I cannot see, how the resurrection of souls can literally mean the resurrection of bodies. Now, if the resurrection here spoken of be not a literal, but a figurative resurrection; the same reasons lead us to conclude, that Christ will not come down from heaven personally to reign on earth; but that he will reign spiritually in the prevalence of his gospel, and by his Holy Spirit in the hearts of men in general. The scriptures speak of his “sitting on the right hand of God” in heaven, till he shall come again to judge the world. (Notes, 1:7. Matt. 25:31—33. Acts 1:9—12. 3:19—21. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Heb. 9:27,28.) Observe, that in the last quotation, the coming of Christ to judge the world, is expressly called “the second time;” but on the supposition which we combat, his coming to judgment will be the third time. The expressions concerning his coming to destroy Jerusalem, (Notes, Matt. 24:29—31. Mark 13:24—31.) and those that relate to his presence with and coming to his people, are stronger than any here used; yet no good expositor interprets them of his personal presence as Man, in the primary meaning of them. (Notes, John 14:18—24.)—Multitudes then of believers will be raised up at the time predicted, as if animated by the souls of those who had been martyred for Christ, or had protested against antichrist; even as the witnesses were “raised again after three days and a half.” (Note, 11:7—12.) These excellent persons will live and reign on earth, in victory, honor, holiness, and joy; being happy in the gracious presence of Christ with their souls, and in their assemblies; (Notes, Matt. 18:19,20. 28:19,20.) and without any enemies, or false teachers, to harass, corrupt, or divide them: but “the rest of the dead will not live till the thousand years be ended.” “There is mention made in this ‘prophecy of two sorts of dead persons; those who were slain for the witness of Jesus, and those who were slain by the sword of him that

‘sat on the horse. The former were raised to ‘life, and lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years; but the others lived not again till ‘the thousand years were finished; they had no ‘successors of the same wicked and persecuting ‘spirit, till the devil was let loose after the Millennium.’ Guise. This interpretation suits the style of the book, and is to me perfectly satisfactory. The language itself intimated a figurative resurrection, and therefore it was carefully distinguished from the literal resurrection of the dead. (Notes, John 5:24—29.) It is moreover an instance of that wise and proper obscurity, which we always find in prophecies, previous to their accomplishment. —“This is the first resurrection,” a spiritual and mystical resurrection; and they who shall partake of it, living in those happy times, will be holy and blessed, far more than Christians in other ages. (Note, 19:9,10.)—When it is added, that “the second death shall have no power over them,” it is implied, that they must enter heaven by passing through the first death: nor is there any thing different in what follows, from the language used concerning believers of other times, except that they shall “reign with Christ a thousand years;” which naturally signifies, that a succession of such triumphant Christians, made honorable and happy by the Lord’s special presence with them, shall continue through the Millennium; even as the two witnesses prophesied in sackcloth, through the whole term of the reign of Antichrist. But on the supposition of a literal resurrection before the Millennium, the expression would imply, that none, except those who were partakers of it, would be free from the dread and danger of the second death.—Some expositors compute the thousand years, after the same manner, as the “three years and a half,” or “twelve hundred and sixty days,” have been reckoned, each day to signify a year; which would extend this happy period, to 360,000 years at least: this however, seems so much beyond all proportion to the past duration of the world, and so different from all the views elsewhere given of the speedy approach of the day of judgment, that it is not generally regarded. So that, on the whole, we may expect, that a thousand years will follow the final destruction of all the antichristian, idolatrous, persecuting powers; during which pure Christianity, in doctrine, worship, and universal holiness, will be diffused all over the earth; and that all idolatry, infidelity, impiety, superstition, heresy, false religion, injustice, fraud, oppression, cruelty, war, murder, intemperance, licentiousness, with all other evils, which now harass and desolate the earth, will be restrained by the omnipotent operation of the Holy Spirit; and that godliness, righteousness, peace, truth, purity, and love, will render the earth in some measure like heaven itself.—Hitherto the depravity of human nature, and the malignant agency of apostate angels, have been illustrated and displayed, in the state of the world: and the inefficacy of all human inventions, and even of “the word of truth,” without the new creating “Spirit of truth,” to remedy these evils, has been demonstrated, in opposition to man’s proud reasonings. The event of the trial has shown, that nothing, but the power of God himself, can prevent men from listening to the temptations of fallen angels; or from despising, opposing, neglecting, or perverting, the gospel of salvation itself. But at length the Lord will arise; by the almighty power of his providence, he will confine fallen angels; and by the omnipotent operation of his Spirit, he will new create fallen men, generally all over the earth: and then repentance, faith, and holiness will as certainly prevail, as impotence, unbelief, and unholiness now do. Still, however, Christianity will be the religion of sinners, and there will be defects and sins in believers, and doubtless some unconverted persons, for a short part of their lives at least: for men will be made holy by regeneration, not born holy; and therefore they will still continue liable to many natural evils, and to death. Yet that measure of righteousness, which such a prevalence of true Christianity must produce, will immensely lessen the quantity even of natural evil.—We may easily perceive, what a variety of dreadful pains, diseases, and other grievous calamities, must cease, were all men true and consistent Christians. All the evils of public and private contention will be terminated: domestic, relative, and social felicity must be exceedingly enhanced. Industry in useful things, with frugality and temperance, would prevent that pinching poverty and distress, which now render multitudes wretched: and a greater fertility of the earth may reasonably be expected; according to the former fruitfulness of Canaan, contrasted with its present sterility. Every man will then try to alleviate, instead of adding to, the unavoidable sorrows of all around him; nor “shall they hurt or destroy in all the holy mountain” of God. The hope of glory, the prospects of a happy meeting in heaven, and the abundant consolations of the holy Spirit, will render sickness, death, and the loss of beloved friends, far more tolerable than at present: “while communion with God,” and “the communion of the saints,” all being of one heart in the worship and service of God, will make religion a constant feast for their souls; and only inferior to heavenly felicity, because not absolutely perfect. Every one must likewise perceive, how immensely the human species would be increased, if wars, many destructive employments, and intemperance were put an end to; and God’s ordinance of marriage were generally substituted, instead of that compound of licentiousness and selfishness, which constitute a vicious celibacy, at least till the prime of life is past; or that forced and prudential celibacy, which comparative or real poverty, united with distrust of Providence, often occasions: things which exceedingly tend to corrupt the morals of the human species; and to destroy the lives of both sexes in youth, almost as much as war itself. We may therefore readily allow, that the number of persons, who shall live on earth, during the Millennium, may be immensely greater, than the whole multitude of all the preceding ages; and, consequently, that far more of the human race may yet be saved than shall perish; even though we do not agree to the computations which have been made concerning it.—The wild notions and extravagant practices, grafted on the belief of a Millennium, have long rendered the name of it contemptible or hateful to numbers: yet we have as just grounds to expect such a happy event, as the Jews had to look for a Messiah; but those who suppose it will be a carnal Millennium, are as much mistaken, as the Jews were in waiting for a temporal Deliverer. It is our duty to pray for the promised glorious days, and to do every thing, in our private or public situations, which can be instrumental in preparing the way for them; even as David made abundant provision for the temple, which Solomon was to build.—Whether the general opinion, that this thousand years will be the seventh thousand from the creation, or the sabbatical millenary, the event must determine: it is evident, however, that the dawn of this glorious day cannot be very distant.—The rest of, &c. (5) ‘It is only the rest that were slain, (19:21.) ‘that “lived not again.” It is only those, who ‘had no share in the first resurrection, and so ‘were neither blessed nor holy (6), nor had ‘their names written in the book of life; and, ‘consequently, those, on whom the second ‘death had taken place; which death they suffered, when “fire came down from heaven and ‘devoured them,” and “they were cast into the ‘lake of fire with the devil.” (10,15.) And ‘that “the rest” should signify the same persons, cannot seem strange, if we consider, that ‘only four verses intervene betwixt them. And ‘that they must be the same persons, is evident ‘from the connexion of the words; “The rest ‘of the dead lived not, till the thousand years,” ‘of Satan’s binding, and the saints’ reign, were ‘ended.—The dead church lives again, in the ‘same metaphorical sense, in which the rest of ‘the dead, the enemies of the church, live again ‘at the end of the thousand years, when Satan ‘is loosed, and gathers them to battle against ‘the church. The “souls of them, who were ‘slain for the testimony of Jesus, and for the ‘word of God,” are those Christians, who were ‘slain in the time of the ten persecutions; ‘(Note, 6:9—11.) and the souls of them, who ‘worshipped not the beast, are those Christians, who chose rather to die, ... than to be ‘guilty of Romish idolatry: and they are said ‘to live again; as the beast, who had received ‘the wound of death, lived again, in the ‘succession of the antichristian beast, ... who exercised the power of the heathen emperors ‘over the earth, and revived the idolatry of the ‘heathen empire. And as the two witnesses, ‘when slain, are said to live again, ... because ‘a succession of men of the same faith, and the ‘same opposition to the beast, revive and flourish, after they are slain.’ Whitby. (Notes, Is. 26:19. Ez. 37:1—14.)—It appears to me undoubted, that the fathers or early writers of the Christian Church in general expected a Millennium; and several of them, a Millennium not materially differing from that above described. But others, gradually following the impulse of imagination, speculation, and carnal passions, advanced sentiments on the subject, so extravagant, so ridiculous, and even so licentious, that sober, yet injudicious men, became ashamed of the general doctrine. Thus it was disgraced, and almost forgotten, during many centuries: but, about the Era of the Reformation, it was again revived; and again still more deeply disgraced, by the wild reveries and practical atrocities of those who maintained it, and rendered it subservient to rebellions, insurrections, and every abomination. But, for some considerable time past, the question concerning a Millennium, has been brought forward and discussed in a more sober and holy manner: and, notwithstanding that some still maintain the doctrine of a literal resurrection, and a personal visible reign of Christ on earth, and others favor the view above given; yet it is evident, that the doctrine itself gains more general credence; is supported, or allowed, by writers of widely discordant theological opinions; and has lost by far the greater part of that odium and contempt which formerly attached to it. Nor can I doubt that, in proportion as the scriptures are diligently and impartially searched and understood, the more generally and unreservedly will the persuasion prevail, that there shall be a Millennium; that it is at hand, even at the door; and that we ought to advert to it, and to those things which may prepare the way for it, in all our studies and writings, and in the improvement of our several talents.—Many things, taken from the concluding chapters of this book, and connected with the opinion of the Millennium, either as directing our expectations respecting it, or as forming objections to it, will, I trust, be proved to relate exclusively to the heavenly world, and the state of the redeemed, subsequent to the day of judgment.—It may, however, be reasonably conjectured, that the restoration to purity and peace, of the Christian church, will be connected with the conversion of the Jews, as a nation, and their reinstatement in their own land: and that this will introduce the conversion of the nations, in which the converted Jews will be most diligent and successful instruments. This seems to be foretold in many prophecies already considered: yet the event alone can fully show the order, manner, and instruments of their accomplishment.—Reigned. (4) Note, 5:8—10.

God will remove the restraint which had been laid on Satan and his angels, for reasons which we are not competent to understand; perhaps, among others, to show that the long continued happy estate of the world, was not the effect of any amelioration of human nature, as descended from fallen Adam; but of an immediate divine influence on the minds of men by regeneration, “to the praise of the glory of his grace.” Being “loosed out of his prison,” this great deceiver will again exert himself, and soon excite agents, who with all earnestness, subtlety, and sagacity will corrupt the gospel; and seduce men into apostacy, idolatry, heresy, infidelity, and vice: and thus, the old generation of believers dying, the succeeding race, through many nations, in “the four quarters of the earth,” will be deceived by him: and, having themselves departed from the faith, they will be instigated to hate and persecute such as adhere to it. Thus the spirit of antichrist will rise again after the thousand years are expired. Then religious wars will be undertaken, and at length the whole multitude of the apostate nations, even Gog and Magog, as risen again, (Note, 4—6. Ez. 38:2.) will confederate against the church, and come to fight against her, with armies innumerable as the sand of the sea. It is in vain to inquire, who Gog and Magog will be, or whence they will come: for this also must be understood figuratively, to denote enemies fierce and numerous, as Gog and Magog had been before the Millennium; and it is expressly said, that they “were the nations in the four quarters,” or corners “of the earth.”—When Satan and his angels shall be loosed, a few years will suffice to seduce multitudes into idolatry or infidelity; and then persecutions and massacres of Christians will be as natural as ever, and as readily resorted to; so that it will probably appear to the pious remnant, as if the cause of Christ was about to be altogether ruined. But while these enemies, with most formidable preparations, shall collect from various parts of the world, to compass “the camp,” or garrison, “of the saints,” and to besiege “the beloved city” Jerusalem, (for the images are borrowed from the affairs of Israel, in the wilderness, and in Canaan,) they will be destroyed by fire from Heaven. Then the Lord, having once more made manifest the depravity of human nature, and the malice and subtlety of the devil, will cast him finally into “the lake of fire,” never more to be set at liberty, or to have power to do mischief; but to be for ever and ever punished with persecuting tyrants, idolatrous and wicked priests, and false teachers; who were his prime ministers, during his usurpation, “as god and prince of this world.” (Notes, 1—3. 12:7—12. 19: 17—21.)—The opinion, that some remote nations will continue idolaters, during the whole term of the Millennium, and, at the close of it, come forward as persecutors of the church, which some respectable writers have advanced, and almost taken for granted, seems to have no scriptural support, except that Gog and Magog are mentioned both by Ezekiel and St.

John. (Notes, Ez. 38: 39:) It is however indisputable, that Ezekiel's prophecy relates to events previous to the Millennium; and that St. Johns speaks of transactions subsequent to the Millennium. Magog is mentioned among the sons of Japheth; (Note, Gen. 10:1—5.) and is generally supposed to have been the progenitor of the nations formerly called Scythians, and in modern times, Tartars; but not of them exclusively; and Gog may be considered as the name, or title, of their king. But, if the same nation be literally and exclusively meant, it may apply to the descendants of Magog, as well after the Millennium, as before; and Gog (as Pharaoh, Ptolemy, &c.) may be still considered, as the title of their prince. This, however, can hardly be allowed; because Gog and Magog, in Ezekiel, come exclusively from "the north quarters;" Gog and Magog; in St. John, come, "from the four quarters of the earth."—The supposition of whole nations continuing idolaters, throughout the Millennium, cannot be made consistent with the general tenor of prophecy; or in particular with these predictions: "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ." (Note, 11:15—18.) "All kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall do him service." (Note, Ps. 72:8—11.) "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea." (Note, Hab. 2:12—14.) "And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom; that all people, nations, and languages should serve him." (Notes, Dan. 2: 34—36, 44, 45. 7:9—14.) Many others to the same effect might be adduced.—It cannot reasonably be supposed, that when Satan, with the beast and the false prophet, is removed, and prevented from deceiving the nations; that whole nations should still continue under the gross deception of open idolatry; and if human depravity alone be sufficient (as indeed it is) to account for this; how can it be conceived, that the same depravity should fail to stir up the idolaters to war against the church? Will then a perfect neutrality prevail? Will the zealous Christians of the Millennium, during ten whole centuries at least, make no efforts to convert the idolatrous nations? Or will these nations adhere to their idolatry; and yet show no enmity against those who zealously and perseveringly attempt their conversion? All this is so contrary to scriptural statements, and to the known and experienced propensities of human nature, that it is wonderful it should have been overlooked on this argument.—All over the earth, I apprehend, men will generally be changed by divine grace: but they will be holy, not by natural birth, but by regeneration. Their children will have the same fallen nature, as ours have: and, if left unregenerate, and exposed to Satan's temptations and delusions, a few years will suffice to raise up Gog and Magog from the dead (5). The same causes will produce the same effects; enmity against God will express itself by enmity against his people; the old scenes will be acted over again, and religious wars, persecutions, and massacres, with attempts to exterminate the hated company must follow more and more; did not God at once interpose to protect his friends, to destroy his enemies, and to bring forward the solemn and long expected day of judgment.

Note.—After the events above predicted, the end will speedily come: and there are no prophetic intimations of any thing, which shall intervene; before the appearing of Christ to raise the dead, and to judge the world. For the apostle next "saw a great white throne," as emblematical of the majesty, dominion, power, and righteousness, with which Christ will then be manifested. On this sat One, "from whose presence the earth and heaven fled away;" which, with unexampled and inimitable sublimity, denoted the effulgency of his glory; and the entire dissolution of the visible creation, or the present state of the world, by his power, and at his coming. (Notes, 6:15—17. Matt. 24:29—35. Heb. 1:10—12.)—It is 'so plain that it does not need, so majestic and 'grand that it exceeds commentary and paraphrase.' Blackwall.—Beyond doubt, it is the grandest idea, which ever was expressed in human language; unless some verses in the first of Genesis may be thought to rival it. The sublime conceptions and expressions of the most admired heathen poets, are flat, and mean, and low, compared with it.—The apostle then beheld the dead, as raised again, "stand before God." We know that Christ shall "sit on the throne of his glory," to judge the world; and he must, therefore, be here meant. (Notes, Matt. 25:31—46. Mark 8:38. John 5:20—23.

Heb. 9:27, 28. 2 Pet. 3:10—13.)—Before him all nations, and all persons, of every rank, character, and description, were gathered. "And the books were opened." This figuratively represents the discoveries, which will be made of all the thoughts, words, actions, motives, intentions, dispositions, obligations, advantages, and talents of all men, by the divine omniscience; and the comparison of the whole with the holy law of God; and the recollection and consciousness, which every man will have of all his past actions, though he had long forgotten many of them, till thus brought to light and to remembrance. Thus an exact estimate will be made of every person's character; of the evidence and degree of his grace, and of his fruitfulness in good works, or of the aggravations or alleviations of his sins: and the final award will be made in perfect justice and impartiality, connected with truth and mercy. For "another book was opened, which is the book of life;" otherwise all must have been condemned. This is the emblem of the Lord's knowledge of his people; and his declaration of their repentance, faith, love, and good works, as evidential of their election, redemption, regeneration, and interest in his righteousness, and the blessings of the new covenant. So that "the dead shall be judged," according to the contents of these registers concerning them; and according to their works, whether they evidence them to be true believers, or the contrary. Nor will any be exempted from this impartial scrutiny: for the sea shall "give up the dead" bodies, which have been cast into it; and the grave, and separate state, (Note, Ps. 16:8—11.) will give up the bodies and souls contained in them: so that the whole multitude, which shall have lived upon earth, through all generations, from the creation to the consummation of all things, will then appear before the throne; all that ever have died, shall experience a re-union of their souls with their bodies; and those who shall then live on earth will be changed. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:50—58. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) Then death and hell, the grave, and the separate state, (represented as two persons,) will "be cast into the lake of fire:" that is, they shall subsist no longer, to receive the bodies and souls of men; there shall be no death in heaven; and all the wicked will be cast into the place of torment, in which death and the separate state will be swallowed up: for "this is the second death," the final separation of sinners from God, without hopes of being restored to his favor, or delivered from his wrath. (Notes, Hos. 13:14. 1 Cor. 15:50—54.) Into this place of banishment and torment, all will be cast, who shall not be "found written in the book of life," as true believers; according to the general doctrine of the holy scriptures.—"The meaning is, that 'temporal death, which hitherto had exercised dominion over the race of men, shall be 'totally abolished; and, in respect of the wicked, be converted into eternal death.' Bp. Newton.—Books. (12) Notes, Dan. 7:9—14. Mal. 3:13—18.—Book of life.] Marg. Ref. t.—Notes, 3:4—6. 13:8—10. 19:7,8.—"The lake of fire" seems distinct from "the abyss" before spoken of.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

We all are, and must be, very incompetent judges concerning the dispensations of God, till the whole plan shall be completed.—Hitherto Satan and his party have been permitted to prosper in an amazing degree; and whole nations, yea, almost all nations, have been "deceived by the old serpent" and his agents: but if partial restraints had not been imposed on them, and unmerited mercy had not been exercised, this earth would have been a counterpart of hell. Ere long, however, "the Lord will make bare his holy arm," to chain up "the deceiver of the nations," and to give effectual success to his gospel; and the earth shall "be filled with his glory, as the waters cover the sea." We shall not indeed live on earth to witness those happy days: yet, if indeed on the Lord's side, we may look forward with encouragement, amidst our conflicts and trials, assured that the cause, in which we are engaged, will at length, even on earth, be decidedly triumphant.—"Great grace" will indeed be on all the hundreds of millions of Christians, who shall then inhabit the earth, and the Lord will manifest himself to them in a degree, of which we now have no adequate conception; so that they will be "holy and blessed" beyond all former generations: we shall not, however, wish to leave our heavenly mansions, to come and dwell among them. They will be out of the reach of the "second death;" but we shall have got over the pain of the "first death:" our spiritual and royal priesthood will be more advantageously exercised in heaven, than theirs can be on earth; and Satan and sin can never more annoy us; but these will never be finally banished from the world, till it is burnt up with all its works. We shall look down, as it were, from heaven, and enjoy the felicity and triumph of our brethren on earth, as much as if we lived among them; while, "being absent from the body, we shall be present with the Lord," in a still more blessed way, than they can be, who "walk by faith, not by sight." But may not these reflections, on the blessed change which the success of the gospel will make in the state of the world, supply us with an unanswerable argument of its divine original and authority, even previous to the fulfilment of those prophecies, which relate to it? Can that doctrine come from any other, than God, which wants only to be universally received with obedient faith, to remedy all the evils that fill the earth; and to render men as much like holy and happy angels, as most of them at present are like deceitful, malignant, ambitious, and apostate spirits? The need, in which the world stands, of such a remedy, the suitableness of it, its evident tendency, and its efficacy, as far as men actually use it, proclaim its divinity in the most decisive manner; even apart from miracles, fulfilments of prophecy, and all other external arguments whatsoever; yea, in language distinct from, though connected with, that "witness in himself," which is the principal source of assurance to the experienced believer's heart. (Notes, 2 Pet. 1:19. 1 John 5:9,10.)

V. 7—15.

Whenever the Lord takes off the restraint from Satan, he is both active and able to deceive the nations, and to propagate lies and mischief among men; and then persecution again lifts up its horrid front, and stalks abroad to riot and revel upon the blood of the saints.—We may even learn profitable lessons from the devil and his angels: for if the servants and ministers of Christ were as united, active, vigilant, and persevering in doing good, as these enemies are in doing mischief, we might hope for better times. Nor shall we do amiss in taking the hint from them, not to think the least opportunity of good beneath our notice; whilst we aspire and aim at the most extensive and important usefulness; for our enemies, when forming horrid plans to destroy, if it were possible, the whole church at once, do not neglect to deceive one soul; or even to defile, mislead, or harass the meanest of those, whom they cannot ruin!—But no weapons formed against the church can prosper; (Notes, Is. 41:10—16. 49:24—26. 54:15—17. Zech. 12:2—14. 14:) and all that fight against her shall perish, “with the devil, the beast, and the false prophet,” and be “tormented day and night for ever and ever.” May we then firmly believe, that ‘Christ shall come to be our Judge,’ and daily prepare to stand before his awful tribunal, when the “earth and the heaven shall flee from his face, and no place shall be found for them.” Let us frequently reflect on “the opening of the books,” the “bringing to light of the hidden things of darkness,” and the discovery of all characters and actions in their proper colors, which will take place, when the Judge shall “render to every one according to his works.” (Note, 1 Cor. 4:1—5.) Then all the dead shall be raised; all distinctions swallowed up, except that “between the righteous and the wicked;” and all will be “cast into the lake of fire,” “prepared for the devil and his angels,” except the believing and obedient followers of Christ, “whose names are written in the book of life.” “Let no man, therefore, deceive himself with vain words; for the wrath of God will come on all the children of disobedience,” how many soever they be. “Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father;” and “death shall be swallowed up in victory.” “He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches.”

CHAP. XXI.

A general representation of the heavenly state; connected with invitations, encouragements, and warnings, 1—8. A more particular description of it, under the emblem of a most glorious city coming down from heaven, 9—21; in which the redeemed dwell in the presence, light, and glory of God and the Lamb, 22—27.

Note.—Some interpreters, especially among those who hold a literal resurrection at the beginning of the Millennium, and the personal reign of Christ on earth for a thousand years, (Note, 20:4—6.) understand these concluding chapters principally of the state of the church on earth at that time. But they come in order subsequent to the account of the general judgment; and we can never attain to a satisfactory understanding of prophecy, if imagination or conjecture be allowed to carry us backward or forward, without any fixed principles. The method which we should take, of clearing up the evidence of the divine inspiration of scripture, from the accomplishment of prophecy, (and this is no doubt one principal weapon, with which to defend Christianity against all kinds of infidels,) must be, by showing, that there is order and arrangement in the predictions, and a coincidence between them and known facts: and that a regular series of events is foretold, some of which are already fulfilled; and the rest cannot be so, because the order of the prophecy shows them to be yet future.—But, in order to this, we must carefully adhere to the proposed arrangement, in our interpretations; not deviating even from the appearance of it, without evident reason. For example, there was a necessity of returning, at the beginning of the twelfth chapter, to the primitive times of Christianity; because another regular series of predictions is there evidently begun, after the other had been completed. (Notes, 10:2—4. 11:15—19. 12:1,2.) This creates a proper degree of prophetic obscurity; and when the key is found, it adds to the consistency, energy, and beauty of the whole. But, having now traced both parts of the book to the end of the world, and the final judgment with its consequences, it must introduce much perplexity, and occasion an appearance of uncertainty and ambiguity, to return back, without any necessity, to the preceding Millennium. As many ages of persecution and tribulation had been predicted; and as this book was in good measure written for the support and encouragement of believers, during those afflicting scenes; so we might naturally expect to hear towards the conclusion of it, some account of their happy state in heaven, as well as of the prosperous times of the church on earth. (Notes, 7:9—17.) But if these chapters do not relate to that subject, we hear indeed of the punishment of the wicked, but nothing concerning the felicity of the righteous. (Note, 20:11—15.) Many of the expressions also are such, as cannot consist with any state, where the least remains of sin or sorrow are to be found, or any return of them is to be expected: and those which seem of another nature, are emblematical, according to the style of the whole book; which differs from all others in the New Testament, though it resembles many of the prophecies of Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Zechariah. These reasons induce me to explain what follows of the heavenly state exclusively; except as the reader's thoughts are naturally called off, in some places to other subjects.—The emblem of "a new heaven and a new earth," has several times occurred, in different senses. (Notes, Is. 65: 17—19. 66:19—23.) Some think that Peter wrote after the book of Revelation was published, and alluded to it; (Note, 2 Pet. 3:10—13.) but this opinion is highly improbable; and the Holy Spirit might lead both the sacred writers to the same views and images. It is obvious, however, that Peter spoke of the heavenly state; which is an additional argument to prove that John did the same: and indeed this must be so; for the "first heaven and earth were passed away." (20:11.)—In this new world, "there was no sea;" which aptly represents an entire freedom from polluting and conflicting passions, distressing temptations, tempestuous troubles, changes, and alarms; and from whatever can divide or interrupt 'the communion of saints' with each other. Some think it implies also, that there is abundance of room in that blessed world; as a very large proportion of the earth is now covered with the sea.—The apostle likewise saw "the holy city, coming down from heaven;" the whole church triumphant was shown to him under this emblem; that he might perceive and report something of its glory and felicity, according to man's capacity of apprehending heavenly things; and he thus learned, that its blessedness came wholly from God, and depended on him. It seems to have appeared in the air just before him, that he might contemplate and examine it; (Note, Acts 10:9—16.) and he perceived that it was prepared as "a bride adorned for her nuptials;" which was another emblem denoting the mutual love between Christ and his triumphant church; their union and communion, and delight in each other; and the glory and felicity thus bestowed upon believers in heaven. (Note, 19:7, 8. Ps. 45:9—17.) Thus two emblems, which apparently are not very compatible, concur in giving some instructive idea of this interesting but inconceivable subject.—He then "heard a great voice from heaven," proclaiming, with astonishment at the divine condescension, that "the tabernacle of God was placed with men," and that he would dwell among them as their reconciled Father, notwithstanding all their rebellions! (Notes, 1 Kings 8:17. Ps. 68:18. Is. 57:15,16. John 1:14. 2 Cor. 6:14—18.) They would therefore be "his people," devoted to his service and glory, and he would be with them, as their all-sufficient and eternal Portion. (Marg. Ref. k.) This has indeed a partial accomplishment, in the present consolations of true believers; but here it must refer to the perfect enjoyment of God in the beatific vision: for "He will then wipe away all tears from their eyes," like a tender Father, who comforts his mourning children, and they will never weep again, either for sin or trouble; as death, and every cause of grief, shall be no more, and "the former things will be passed away." Can these expressions relate to any thing less than the heavenly state? (Notes, 7: 13—17. 22:2—5. Is. 25:6—9. 35:8—10.)—There was no more sea. (1) 'It is evident from hence, that this new heaven and new earth are not designed to take place, till after 'the general judgment: for at the general judgment, "the sea gave up the dead which were in it." (20:13.) Gog and Magog, the nations in the four corners of the earth, are deceived by Satan, after the expiration of the Millennium: but Gog and Magog are not inhabitants of "the new heaven and the new earth."—"The church of Christ shall be glorious upon earth during the Millennium; and it shall be more glorious still, in the new earth after the Millennium, to all eternity.' Bp. Newton.

No more death. (4) Marg. Ref. m.—No expression equally strong on this particular, occurs in any part of scripture, except where the heavenly state is evidently intended. 'Ο θάνατος οὐκ ἔσται ἐν τῷ.

5 And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new. And he said unto me, Write; for these words are true and faithful.

6 And he said unto me, It is done. I am Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the End. I will give unto him that is athirst of the Fountain of the water of life freely.

7 He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son.

8 But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone; which is the second death.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—"He that sat on the throne," generally in this book denotes the Father personally, as distinguished from "the Lamb that was slain;" but as Christ will appear on the throne of judgment, and had been last mentioned as seated on "the great white throne," (Note, 20: 11—15.) it is most obvious to understand the clause of him in this place; and the language employed seems most exactly to accord to him, in his mediatorial character.—The Lord Jesus, therefore, declared in the apostle's hearing, that "He makes all things new." He brings sinners into a new state, and creates them anew to holiness; and he will "make all things new," respecting their situation and manner of living, when he has brought them, perfected both in body and soul, to his glorious felicity. This, John was commanded to "write," for the encouragement of the church, in all its afflictions, conflicts, and temptations; for "these words are true and faithful," on which the most entire dependence may be placed.—The Lord also added, "It is done;" or, "It is come to pass:" the whole counsel of the love of God will be then completed, and the redemption, which the incarnate Son finished on the cross, will be perfectly applied. (16:17. Note, John 19:28—30.) For, being "Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the End," he will surely bring the work which he had begun to a glorious conclusion. (Notes, 1:8—11. 2:8,9.)—If then any man, in any age or place, were athirst for the blessings of salvation; if any one were so sensible of his perishing need of these promised benefits, and had such a view of their preciousness, as to be earnest in using means for obtaining them, and would not be satisfied without them, whatever else he possessed or expected, Christ will surely "give him of the Fountain of the water of life freely." (Notes, 22:1,16,17. Is. 55:1—3. John 4:10—15. 7:37—39.)—Man's sin and folly consist in "forsaking the Fountain of living waters, to hew out broken cisterns, which can hold no water;" his happiness must begin with returning to this Fountain, as opened through the mediation of Christ. (Notes, 7:13—17. Ex. 17:5,6. Ps. 36:5—9. Is. 12:3. 48:14—21. 49:9—13. Jer. 2:13.) Sensual and sinful pleasures are muddy and poisoned waters: the best earthly comforts are like the scanty stagnating supplies of a cistern; when idolized, they become "broken cisterns," and yield only vanity, disappointment, and vexation; and all our labor about them, resembles "hewing out broken cisterns, which can hold no water." But the joys of true religion are like the springing waters from a fountain; pure, refreshing, overflowing, always satisfying, never satiating, abundant and eternal. The sanctifying consolations of the Holy Spirit, being the preparation for heavenly felicity, and the antepast of it, are the streams from this Fountain, which flow for us in the wilderness. To those who thirst for them, Christ will give of these waters "freely," without any price paid for them, even supplies adequate to their largest desires; these shall be furnished from time to time, when they come and ask for them, to be their solace in life, and at the approach of death; and then he will bring them to the Fountain-head, that they may drink for ever full draughts of these holy and glorious joys. All this he gives freely; though he purchased it, by the shedding of his blood upon the cross for their sins. Those who "draw waters from these wells of salvation," have indeed many enemies to encounter: but the Lord assures them, that every conqueror shall "inherit all things;" for "He will be his God, and he shall be his Son," and thus be the heir of all things in him. (Notes, Ps. 22:30,31. Is. 53:9,10. 1 Cor. 3:18—23. Heb. 2:10—13.) On the other hand, "the fearful," who dared not profess the gospel or who renounced it from the dread of reproach and suffering; the cowardly soldiers, who feared the enemy more than their Captain, and so "turned back in the day of battle;" and "infidels," or "unbelievers" of all descriptions; (not the weak in faith, but such as had no faith;) "the abominable," or those who were guilty of unnatural practices; murderers of themselves, or of others, in duels, wars, persecutions, perversion of justice, and oppression; "fornicators," adulterers, and lewd persons of every kind; "sorcerers," the devil's prophets, real or pretended, to which company all pretenders to new revelations belong; "idolaters, and all liars," hypocrites, deceivers, false teachers; all, who lie for gain, or from malice, who thus cheat or slander others; yea, all liars, though they only divert themselves or others, by breaking God's commandments; (Notes, 22:14, 15. 1 Cor. 6:9—11. Gal. 5:19—21. Eph. 5:3—7. 1 Tim. 1:8—11.) all these shall "have their portion in the lake of fire," with the devil and his angels. (*Marg. Note.—“One of the seven angels, who had the seven vials, full of the seven last plagues,” (Notes, 15:1—4. 16:1,2.) having called on John to accompany him, that he might show him “the Bride;” “the wife of the Lamb;” or the church triumphant, after the completion of the sacred union between Christ and his redeemed people, in the glory of heaven; he was, to his own apprehension, (being under the influence of the prophetic Spirit,) carried to an exceedingly high mountain, and shown a city immensely great, descending out of heaven from God. (Notes, 1:9—11. Ez. 8:2—4. 11:22—25. 40:2.) This interchange of emblems from “the Bride, the wife of the Lamb;” to “the holy Jerusalem,” shows, that we should only take general ideas from them, and not enter minutely into particulars, in which there is seldom much agreement: and that our complex view of such subjects must be deduced from the whole of them compared together. (Notes, 1—4. 19:7,8. Gal. 4:21—31. Heb. 12:22—25.) This city was illuminated, beautified, and rendered illustrious beyond expression, by “the glory of God,” beaming full upon it; which shows that the happiness of heaven consists in immediate communications from God, and in conformity to him. (Note, 22—27.) Thus the light, which shone on the city, was like the refulgency of the most admired jewels: the whole as it appeared pendent in the air, shone with surprising lustre and beauty, and was “transparent as crystal:” which may intimate, that our knowledge in heaven will be intimate, certain, and productive of the most satisfying delight. “The great wall of jasper,” (12,17,18.) was in height, or rather in thickness, one hundred and forty-four cubits, according to the measure of a man, from his elbow to the end of his middle finger; for this was the measure used by the angel. (Notes, 11:1,2. Ez. 40:3—5.) This, which was the number of the twelve tribes of Israel multiplied by that of the twelve apostles, may denote the entire security of that residence, which the almighty God has prepared for the whole increase of both the Old and the New Testament churches, when collected together in heaven; where no enemy can approach to annoy, or alarm them for ever. (Notes, 7:4—8. 14:1—5.) “Twelve gates,” guarded by twelve angels, and inscribed with the “names of the twelve tribes of Israel,” implied, that this holy city was open on every side, for the admission of the true Israel of God, even all his believing servants, and to none else: and that angels rejoiced in their security and felicity in heaven, as well as readily ministered to them, during their progress thither. (Notes, Ez. 48:30—35.) The “twelve foundations, inscribed with the names of the twelve apostles,” and formed of twelve precious stones, (which John in vision saw in the same manner as he did the rest, the whole being seen pendent in the air,) might show, that all who belonged to that holy city obtained their citizenship, by receiving and obeying the doctrine of the apostles respecting Christ and his salvation, as “the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.” The whole city rests primarily on Christ himself, “the tried Foundation;” and, in a subordinate sense, on those who published and attested the true doctrine concerning him, who will be honored there in a peculiar manner: nor will any person enter thither, who does not hold the doctrine of the apostles, in its grand outlines; for thus it has been believed by the church, ever since the first promise to fallen man. (Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. Eph. 2:19—22.) The precious stones may denote, that all earthly splendor is mean and contemptible, compared with that of heaven; and that all possible excellency and glory will there combine, abound, and centre for ever. (Notes, Ez. 28:15—29. Is. 54:11—14.) The vast dimensions of the city, being an exact square, fifteen hundred miles on each side, might be emblematical of magnificence, and of room for all the multitude of inhabitants, which should ever enter it, however immense and innumerable. As it is inconceivable how a city could be fifteen hundred miles high; when it is said, that “the length, breadth, and height were equal;” some conclude that no more is meant, than that the height was proportionable to the other dimensions. The whole, however, is enigmatical: and as a cube seems a kind of perfect form, perhaps the language is to be understood according to its obvious meaning: and then we may consider it as an intimation, that the reader is not allowed to form any gross conceptions of the city in his imagination, but to deduce instruction from it, as an emblem. It may also imply the stability, proportion, and uniformity of heavenly things, and the incomprehensible nature and glory of them. (Note, Eph. 3:14—19.)—The city, and the street of it, being “of pure gold, as it were transparent glass,” may be an emblem of the union in heaven of those excellencies, which seem here to be incompatible. ‘They will be splendid, and durable as the purest gold; clear and transparent as the finest glass. In that happy world, the beauties and advantages, which are here divided and incompatible, will unite and agree. Our glass is clear, but brittle; our gold is shining and solid, but it is opaque, and discovers only a surface. And thus it is with our minds. The powers of the imagination are lively and extensive, but transient and uncertain. The powers of the understanding are more solid and regular, but at the same time more slow and limited, and confined to the outside properties of the few objects around us. But when we arrive within the veil, the perfections of the glass and gold will be combined, and the imperfections of each will entirely cease. Then we shall know more than we can now imagine. The glass will be all gold. And then we shall apprehend truth in its relations and consequences, not, as at present, by that tedious and fallible process which we call reasoning, but by a single glance of thought, as the sight pierces in an instant through the largest transparent body. The gold will be all glass. Newton’s Cardiphonia.—The twelve gates made of as many vast pearls, may denote that every thing will be superlatively glorious, beyond all comparison with any thing ever seen on earth.—The marginal references will show the reader, in a manner suited to excite a peculiar interest, that even in those things, which are stated as the glory of the antichristian harlot, the true spouse of Christ will infinitely exceed her. Note.—The temple was essential to Jerusalem, the holy city in Judea, as its great ornament and honor; and it made a prominent part in Ezekiel’s vision of the church, as I suppose, during the Millennium, under the emblem of the holy city. (Notes, Ez. 40:—48.) But “there was no temple” in the mystical city that John saw; which is a demonstration that the heavenly state was exclusively meant. In heaven there will be no need of external symbols of the Lord’s presence; when he shall be fully manifested in his essential glory, as far as is reasonable, and holy creatures can possibly perceive and know him. He will be evidently among them, to communicate unalloyed felicity, and to receive their adorations; and the eternal Son, in human nature, as “the Lamb that was slain,” will be “the Temple,” in which “all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling bodily,” will be made manifest to the glorified bodies of the saints; whilst the perfections of the divine nature will be contemplated as “with open face,” by the exercise of their intellectual powers. (Notes, 22:2—5. John 1:14,18. 2 Cor. 3:17,18. Col. 1:18—20. 2:8,9.)—Neither will this holy city need “the sun or moon to lighten it,” or any of the things, which outwardly contribute to our comfort, and are suited to our state, on earth; for “the glory of God will lighten it,” yea, the Lamb “will be the Light” and Felicity of it. (Notes, Ps. 36:5—9. 84:8—12. Is. 30:26. 60:15—22. Mal. 4:2, 3. 2 Cor. 4:3—6.) What words can more fully express the mysterious union and co-equality of the Son with the Father, in the Godhead?—Let the reader also compare carefully the language with that of those scriptures, which describe in most emphatical terms the most happy and glorious state of the church on earth: and while he perceives some of the same figures employed, he will likewise perceive that this passage is far more energetical than any of them.—The inhabitants of this heavenly city will not only be numerous, far above those of other cities; but even “nations,” many nations of those whom Jesus has saved, will dwell in it, and “walk in the light” of God and the Lamb, perpetually and eternally. If “all the kings of the earth” had concurred to bring the whole of their wealth, magnificence, and glory into one place, it could not have borne any comparison with this holy city. Those kings, who belonged to the true church on earth, though they left all their outward grandeur behind them at death, will yet bring all their real honor into it: and all other glory will be done away, eclipsed, or swallowed up in it.—The gates “not shut by day,” and there being “no night there,” emblematically and affectingly show the liberty, peace, security, and uninterrupted enjoyment of that blessed state: (Note, 7:13—17.) and as believers are “the excellent of the earth,” and enter thither from every nation; so it may literally be said, that “they bring the

Moreover, nothing sinful or unclean, idolatrous, or false and deceitful, can at all find admission into it. All the inhabitants are absolutely perfected in holiness; and all increase, share, and rejoice in each other's felicity; being excellent, loving, and lovely, beyond expression or imagination. ### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

"There remaineth a rest for the people of God:" and when the idolized objects of worldly men's affections and pursuits shall "pass away, and be no more" for ever, believers shall enter "the new heaven and the new earth," "in which dwelleth righteousness;" and where no tumultuous passions, anxious cares, or changing dispensations, shall disturb their repose to all eternity. "But will God indeed dwell with man?" and will he receive man to dwell with him in heavenly felicity? What then should, for a single moment, divert us from seeking so vast a blessing? Or what words can suffice to express our admiring gratitude? May we seek the adorning and beauty of holiness, and earnestly desire to be found accepted in the righteousness of the Redeemer, and adorned with the beauties of holiness; and then the heavenly Bridegroom will find us prepared, and will rejoice over us to do us good for ever. (Notes, Jer. 32:39—41. Zeph. 3:14—17.) Tears may indeed now furrow our cheeks, and anguish may sometimes distract our hearts; because of sin within us and around us, and because of its distressing effects: but speedily our God will "wipe away all our tears;" and we shall feel and see no more "of death, of sorrow, of crying, or of pain for ever." Let us then pray for "patience, that, having done the will of God, we may inherit the promise."—If we are willing and desirous, that the gracious Redeemer should "make all things new," in our hearts and nature, by whatever means he sees good; we need not fear, but that he will "make all things new" in respect of our situation, till he has brought us to the enjoyment of complete felicity: for he is "Alpha and Omega;" his work is perfect, and when he begins to save, he will never leave or forsake those who partake of his grace, and who are the objects of his "everlasting love." If, in bringing us to thirst for the waters of life, he causes us to pass through humiliating dispensations and experiences, we ought not to complain; as this thirst is the preparation for all the blessings of time and eternity, and he will "give to every one that is athirst of the Fountain of the water of life freely." Did we come to him for this blessing more frequently, and pray for it more earnestly, we should be enabled, in the sharpest trials, to realize the Christian paradox, "As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing:" but we are too apt to go to broken cisterns; and no wonder in this case that we "go mourning all the day long."—Let then those, who are engaged in the combat, have recourse to this never-failing cordial; that, by its exhilarating and invigorating efficacy, their strength may be renewed, till they have won the victory, and are owned as children and heirs of God in Christ Jesus, and possess all things in him.—But surely, the curse is also set before us, in this scripture, as well as the blessing: and most loudly does Christ say to all, who hear his word, "Fear not them, who can kill the body, but after that have no more that they can do;" when such cowards, as dare not own Christ on earth, are ranked with the most abominable sinners, as "cast into the lake of fire and brimstone." Should the Lord speak in thunder from heaven, and protest to sinners by name, that they were in the way to hell; it could not be more manifest than it is at present, if men would but notice it: for while they live in infidelity, impiety, or any of the sins here or elsewhere enumerated; does not God say expressly to them, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish?" But, blessed be his name, he says also to the vilest, "Repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out." "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

V. 9—27.

The angels, who "pour out vials of wrath," and inflict plagues on ungodly men, take pleasure in helping the joy of believers: and the mystical espousals of Christ and his church excite their attention, admiration, and rejoicing praises. But the way in which the Lord teaches us the nature of heavenly glories, implies that we are poor ignorant children, too apt to be pleased with trifles and externals; who must be spoken to in our own language; not being capable of knowing things as they are, or of fully relishing the pure and spiritual felicity of the celestial world. Yet, if any thing draw off our affections from earthly objects, to seek "a treasure in heaven," and a permanent mansion in that blessed world, it will be well. "Glorious things are" indeed here "spoken of the city of God;" (Note, Ps. 87:3.) and the whole is well suited to raise our expectations, and enlarge our conceptions, of its security, peace, splendor, purity, and felicity: but, in proportion to our spirituality, we shall be more and more led to contemplate heaven, as filled with "the glory of God," and enlightened by the presence of the Lord Jesus, "the Sun of righteousness," and the Redeemer of lost sinners; knowing that "in his presence is fulness of joy, and pleasures at his right hand for evermore." As nothing unclean can enter thither, let us be stirred up, by these glimpses of heavenly things, in giving diligence to "cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God;" that we may be approved as "Israelites indeed, in whom there is no guile," and have a sure evidence that we are written in the "book of life of the Lamb that was slain, from the foundation of the world."

CHAP. XXII.

A further description of the heavenly state, 1—5. The angel attests these things to be faithful and true, and again forbids John to worship him, 6—9. Christ himself shows the apostle, that the state of men would soon be unchangeably fixed, by his coming to judgment, 10—12. He declares who would enter heaven, and who would be excluded, 13—15. He urgently invites and calls on all who hear, to invite all who are athirst, yea all who are willing, to accept of his salvation; and denounces plagues on all, who add to, or take away from, the words of this prophecy, 16—19. The apostle desires the speedy advent of Christ; and concludes with a benediction on his readers, 20, 21.

AND he showed me <sup>a</sup>a pure River of <sup>b</sup>water of life, <sup>c</sup>clear as crystal, <sup>d</sup>proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb.

Note.—The angel next made known to the apostle, the Source and Current of heavenly blessings, for “he showed him a pure River of water of life.” (Notes, Ps. 36:5—9. 46:4. Ez. 47:1—10.) This implied the holy nature and effects of those unalloyed pleasures, which flow without interruption or end, for the full satisfaction of all the saints in glory. “The River” was “clear,” or transparent, “as crystal;” which may intimate that the happiness of heaven greatly consists in a full, clear and intuitive knowledge of God, and his glorious perfections and works, constantly exciting all holy and delightful affections in the heart. This River “proceeded out of the throne of God and of the Lamb,” as from its fountain; which showed, that all felicity comes from God, as the all-sufficient Source of life, light, holiness, and joy; and that it is communicated according to his wise and holy sovereignty. But the throne of God was the throne of the Lamb also; (3:21.) and “the River of the water of life” flows to sinful men, through the Person of Emmanuel, and his atonement and mediation. This especially points to the quickening and sanctifying influences and consolations of the Holy Spirit, as given to sinners through Jesus Christ, to be the Author of spiritual and eternal life to their souls. (Notes, Ez. 17:5,6. Is. 12:3. John 4:10—15. 7:37—39.) This interpretation, which coincides with so many other scriptures, gives a peculiarly interesting view of the sacred Trinity; the Father, who sent his only begotten Son to be our Saviour; the Son, who, having finished his work on earth, rose and ascended, and “sat down with the Father on his throne, and ever liveth,” as Emmanuel, our divine, our incarnate Mediator; and the Holy Spirit, as ‘proceeding from the Father and the Son,’ to apply, by his new-creating love and power, this salvation to our souls: that ‘Glor.’ may be to ‘the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end.’ (Marg. Ref. d.)

2 In <sup>e</sup>the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there <sup>f</sup>the Tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the Tree were for the <sup>g</sup>healing of the nations.

Note.—“In the midst of the street,” or principal place of concourse in the city, and “on each side of the river, was the Tree of life.” (Notes, 2:6,7. Gen. 2:8,9. 3:22—24.) This seems not here to mean, a single tree, but a species of trees, which grew in the places of public resort for the common benefit of all the inhabitants.—On earth some fruits ripen at one season, and some at another: but this Tree bare “twelve kinds of fruit;” that every month in the year might be supplied, and abundance be united with perpetuity and variety. (Notes, Ez. 47:12.) This was an emblem of Christ, and all the blessings of his salvation, as communicated, constantly and perfectly, to all his redeemed people in heaven, by his own immediate presence with them, and love to them. “The leaves of the Tree,” being appointed “for the healing of the nations,” implied, that the favor and presence of Christ would finally remove and prevent the return and entrance of all evil, as well as communicate all good, to the inhabitants of that blessed world. So that no “more curse would be there;” no sickness, pain, sorrow, wrath, or death: for Adam sinned, even in the garden of Eden, in which grew “the Tree of life,” and so fell with his posterity under the curse; but this will never befall the redeemed; as the same sovereignty and omnipotence, which have saved them, will confirm them for ever. For “the throne of God, and of the Lamb,” being established there; his servants shall “serve” and worship him for ever, which is their great desire and delight: “and they shall see his face,” behold his glory, be assured of his love, and enjoy the fulness of felicity in his presence. (Notes, Matt. 5:8. 1 Cor. 13:8—12. 1 John 3:1—3.) “And his name shall be in their foreheads;” that is, all creatures shall know that they belong to God, and perceive that they bear his holy image.—It is remarkable, that “God and the Lamb,” are here spoken of as One, in such a manner, that we cannot determine to which of them the singular personal pronoun belongs. (Note, John 10:26—31.)—In that world of light and glory there will “be no night;” no affliction, or dejection, no intermission of service and enjoyment: they will need no candle; no diversions or pleasures of man’s devising will there be at all wanted; and even the outward comforts which God has provided, suited to our state in this world, will no longer be requisite. (Notes, 21:22—27. Matt. 22:23—33. 1 Cor. 15:39—49. Phil. 3:20,21.) How very different is this view from a Mohammedan heaven, which could only please gross, sensual, and carnal men, if it were real! But indeed this, and various other notions of heavenly happiness, springing up, as new revelations from time to time; without excepting even the hope of philosophers, of enjoying the pleasure of learned society, an increasing knowledge of nature, and discoveries in science, beyond expression many and great; are mere delusions of the enemy, to soothe men into the opinion, that they may be happy, without submission to the gospel, and without the special favor and enjoyment of God, and without a renewal unto holiness; till the event shall awfully convince them of the fatal delusion. It is indeed most evident, that man, without revelation and regeneration, cannot conceive in what happiness consists. The most ingenious writers, of the pagans, fail in nothing more, than in describing the condition of their gods; who are represented as far removed from true happiness as from holiness, and liable to all the vexations of sinful men, with scarcely any peculiar satisfactions superior to what they enjoy: indeed differing little from them, except in power, knowledge, and exemption from death.—In the 232 opinions mentioned by Varro, concerning the chief good, I apprehend that view here given of it by the apostle did not form one.—“Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.” “Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.”

Note.—(21:5.) The angel's declaration in this passage, that the Lord God had sent him, compared with what follows (16), has been adduced as a conclusive proof of the Deity of Christ. Indeed we meet with this doctrine, in one form or other, continually: and there is no way of avoiding it, but by rejecting, wholly or in part, the divine inspiration of those books in which it is so undeniably contained.—The Lord Jesus then spake by the angel; solemnly attesting the foregoing sayings, however they might seem to exceed all conception and expectation, to be “faithful and true;” and that He, in whose name all “the holy prophets” had spoken, sent his angel to make known events which would speedily take place. (Note, 1:1, 2.) He also declared, that, “He was coming quickly,” to fulfil these prophecies, to punish his enemies, to deliver his servants, and to take their souls to heaven; but especially to raise the dead and judge the world: and he added a blessing on all, who observed, understood, remembered, believed, and obeyed, the sayings contained in this prophecy: (Note, 1:3.) as this could not fail to increase their faith, hope, patience, steadfastness, and propriety of behavior, in the church, and in the world.—“Good Vitringe devoutly wisheth; May the Lord bestow

‘this grace and favor on us, who have employed some time and pains, in the study and explication of this book; that some part of this blessing also may descend to us.’ Bp. Newton.

8 And I John saw these things, and heard them. And when I had heard and seen, <sup>X</sup> I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which showed me these things.

9 Then saith he unto me, <sup>Y</sup> See thou do it not: for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book: <sup>Z</sup> worship God.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—(Note, 19:9,10.) While we are surprised, that the apostle should again fall into his former mistake, and need repeatedly the same admonition, we may observe the great wisdom of God in leaving him to do so. It has been remarked, that the idolatrous worship of saints and angels was one great abomination of that antichristian system, against which this whole prophecy is principally levelled: and here all palliations of that enormity are answered at once; for the most exalted and beneficent creature, when visibly present, would not allow the least appearance of adoration to be rendered to him: whereas the papists worship creatures when not visibly present, and thus ascribe omnipresence and omniscience to them, as well as other divine honors! It also shows the weakness of the Socinian way of accounting for Stephen's adoration of Christ; because, say they, he was visibly present: but if he had not been also truly God, the martyr would nevertheless have been an idolater. Yet Christ neither reproved him, nor any other person, for showing him this kind of honor, or any other; but directly the contrary: he always honored those in a peculiar manner, who thus honored him. (Notes, John 5:20—23. 20:24—29. Acts 7:54—60. 10:24—26.)

11 He <sup>D</sup> that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; <sup>E</sup> and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still.

12 And, behold, <sup>F</sup> I come quickly; <sup>G</sup> and my reward is with me, <sup>H</sup> to give every man according as his work shall be.

Note.—The Lord Jesus is undoubtedly the Speaker in these verses: but some think, that he spoke by the angel as his ambassador; or commanded him to proclaim these awards, in his name, and as immediately from him.—“It was not thought sufficient to represent the angel, speaking in the person of Christ; but Christ ‘himself’ also is introduced; ... speaking in his ‘own person, and confirming the divine author-sity of this book, and attesting it to be properly his revelation.' Bp. Newton. It is, however, more probable, that Christ again appeared in vision to his apostle, to close the prophecy, as he had done at the opening of it. (Notes, 1:9—20.) He directed the apostle "not to seal the sayings of this prophecy," but to publish them for the use of the church. (Notes, 10:2—4. Dan. 8:26. 12:4.) For "the time was at hand," when they would begin to be accomplished, nay, they would all indeed soon be completed. (Note, 2 Pet. 3:8.) And, after all these revelations of the will of God and the way of salvation, and the repeated and most earnest exhortations, invitations, persuasions, and entreaties of Christ, by his ministers, obstinate sinners would at length be left to their perverse choice, without further means being used for their conviction; and believers should be exhorted and encouraged to "perseverance in well-doing:" nay, the time would speedily arrive, when the unjust and filthy, the unpardoned and unregenerate, would be irreversibly fixed in such a state, that they would be "unjust and filthy still," and for ever, without hope or remedy; (Note, Matt. 21:17—20. P. O. 17—27.) and the justified and sanctified believer would be perfected and confirmed for ever in righteousness, holiness, and felicity. For, "behold, Christ was coming quickly," bringing his recompense with him, both for his enemies and his people. (Notes, 20:11—15. Is. 40:9—11. Matt. 25:31—46. 2 Cor. 5:9—12.)

Note.—Those who "do the commandments of God," as delivered to sinners in the gospel, by repentance, faith in Christ, attendance on the means of grace, and renewed unreserved obedience from evangelical motives, are "blessed;" and they have "a right," or privilege, derived from grace, to "the Tree of life," (Note, 2—5.) or all the blessings of salvation by Christ, and admission into heaven; (Note, 21:9—21.) that they may there have fellowship with God and his holy angels, for ever and ever. (Notes, Matt. 7:21—27. 12:46—50.)—But without the city, even "in the lake of fire," (for there is no middle place, or condition, so much as intimated,) "are dogs," selfish, greedy, fierce, and sensual persons, or apostates; (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Matt. 7:6. Phil. 3:1—7.) with others of a like hateful character, especially those who love a carnal, flattering lie, in preference to the holy and humbling truth of God, and who invent and propagate lies for their own selfish purposes: all other liars may also be included. (Note, 21:5—8.)—As idolaters are mentioned separately, the making and worshipping of images cannot, with propriety, be considered as specially intended. But the whole prophecy being, in a peculiar manner, directed against the delusions, or lies, with which "the devil," by means of "the beast and the false prophet," and other impostors, "deceived all the nations of the earth;" and the idolatry of the church of Rome being only a part of her "deceivableness of unrighteousness;" it may fairly be supposed, that they, who thus "spake lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron," were particularly, though not exclusively, meant, by those "who loved and made a lie." Note.—The Lord Jesus, in many respects, used the ministry of an angel, in testifying to the churches, by his servant John, the predictions of this book. (Note, 1:1,2.)—The Saviour in his divine nature, was the Root from whom David sprang; and he was, as Man, his promised seed. (Notes, 5:5—7. Matt. 22:41—46.) He was also "the bright and morning Star." "His rising up in his incarnation, introduced the 'gospel-day: his rising in power introduceth the 'millennial day; his rising in the saving influences of his Spirit, introduceth the spiritual 'day of grace and comfort; and his appearance 'to judge the world, will introduce the eternal 'day of light, purity, and joy.' Brown. (Note, 2:24—28.)—"The Spirit," by the sacred Word, and by his convictions and influence in the sinner's conscience, says, "Come" to Christ for salvation: (Notes, John 16:8—15.) "the Bride," or the whole church militant and triumphant, says "Come," and share our felicity. It therefore behoves every man, who hears the invitation, to call on others, to "come." (Notes, Is. 2:2—5. Jer. 50:4—6. Mic. 4:1—3.) In fine, "let every man," throughout the earth, who "thirsts" for salvation, "come" to Christ. Nay, lest any should hesitate, as not able to determine whether their thirst be spiritual or not, it is added, "Let whosoever will," (or is willing) "come, and take of the water of life freely," as he would take water from a well, which belonged in common to him and to all his neighbors: nor ought he think of paying for these blessings; except as he throws away his poison to receive food, or his dross to receive gold. 18 For <sup>f</sup>I testify unto every man that <sup>g</sup>heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, <sup>h</sup>If any man shall add unto these things, <sup>i</sup>God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book.

Note.—The Lord Jesus concluded this address, and this book, and indeed the whole of his word, by "testifying as the Amen, the true and faithful Witness," (Note, 3:14—16.) to every one who heard the words of this prophecy; that if any man "added any thing" to what was contained in it, as of divine authority, "God shall add to" or heap on him, "the plagues which were written in the book:" and, on the other hand, if any one should presume to "take any thing away" from it; God would take away from him his part "out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book:" even the blessings which he appeared, or thought himself, to be entitled to; or which he otherwise might have obtained. (Notes, 3:4—6. 20: 11—15. 21:9—27.) This seems primarily meant of "the book of Revelation;" with which as much liberty has certainly been taken, as with any part of scripture. But, as the Lord doubtless intended this for the conclusion of the sacred Canon; and as the crime is similar, in respect of all other parts of the word of God; it may fairly be applied to the whole written word: and it warns every man, in the most awful manner, to "add nothing to, and take nothing from," what God has revealed, of doctrine, ordinance, or commandment; the standard of truth, the way of acceptance, the evidence of conversion, or the rule of duty. (Notes, Deut. 4:2. Prov. 30:5,6. Matt. 15:3—14. Luke 11:52.) Enthusiasts, pretenders to new revelations, bigoted sectaries, and imposing churchmen, on the one hand; with infidels and skeptics on the other, and all who to maintain their unscriptural tenets, or to exclude those mysteries which they reject, would either expunge part of the sacred Canon, or invalidate its divine authority; with all those, who think or say that it is of no consequence what men believe, (which takes away all doctrinal truth at once,) have abundant cause to tremble at this solemn warning. Critics, who are continually proposing conjectural alterations, or expunging from the text of scripture, and adding to it, often on frivolous grounds, on slight authority, and in a dogmatical and self-confident spirit, I had almost said, in a wanton manner, are in no small danger: and expositors in general have abundant cause to be cautious and humble. Indeed, I am ready to tremble at the awful responsibility to which I have subjected myself, when I write upon this testimony of Christ, and think of the work in which I have been, during so many years, engaged. But the merciful Saviour will no more condemn unintentional mistakes, in the honest writer, who desires to help men to understand his word, and proceeds in simple, humble dependence on his teaching, than he will the honest preacher: and I trust this effort to explain his holy scriptures, though feeble and defective, has been conducted from proper motives, and in dependence on the Lord. I can confidently appeal to my heart-searching Judge, that I have, as far as I know, written, word for word, what I supposed he would have me write; without adding, altering, or keeping back the sense of any passage, willingly, to serve any personal end, or party-interest, from fear of incurring reproach or opposition, or desire of conciliating the favor of any man or set of men whatever: and that the mistakes which have been made, were involuntary, the effects of ignorance and error, and not of design.—After this most solemn warning, our Lord declared, that he was "coming quickly;" and the apostle, in his own name, and that of the church, added, "Amen, Even so come, Lord Jesus;" and then concluded with the usual benediction on his readers in general, or on the seven churches of Asia in particular. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1:4—6. Mal. 4:4—6. 2 Cor. 13:11—14, v. 14.)—"Men are sometimes apt to think, that if they could but see a miracle wrought in favor of religion, they would readily resign all their scruples, believe without doubt, and obey without reserve. The very thing that you desire you have. You have the greatest and most striking of miracles, in the series of scripture prophecies accomplished; accomplished, as we see, in the present state of almost all nations, the Africans, the Egyptians, the Arabians, the Turks, the Jews, the Papists, the Protestants, Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre, the seven churches of Asia, Jerusalem, and Rome. And this is not a transient miracle, ceasing almost as soon as performed; but is permanent, and protracted through the course of many generations. It is not a miracle delivered upon the report of others, but it is subject to your own inspection and examination. It is not a miracle, exhibited only before a certain number of witnesses; but is open to the observation and contemplation of all mankind; and, after so many ages, is still growing, still improving to future ages.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

May the Lord show to us the streams of "the pure River of the water of life, which proceed out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb;" that, receiving the precious gift of the life-giving Spirit, we may be made meet for "the inheritance of the saints in light." All other streams are polluted or will soon dry up; but this will flow, "clear as crystal," without alloy or interruption, for evermore. They who drink of this water, and eat of "the fruit of the Tree of Life," "shall hunger and thirst no more;" they will soon arrive where sin and sickness shall be no more known for ever, for "the leaves of the tree are for the healing of the nations:" no "curse" will there be found; but blessing only and eternally, "from the throne of God and the Lamb," in the service and presence of their beloved Lord, and in bearing his image, and being filled with all his fulness. No more complaints will then be heard, of darkness, desertion, or temptation; and there will be no need of worldly pleasures or amusements; as "the Lord God giveth them light, and they shall reign for ever and ever." "These are true and faithful sayings;" but they are so vast, that we need to pray continually, "Lord increase our faith," or we shall not be able to receive them, however attested to us.—We should give due honor to the instruments of good to our souls; but we must "worship God" alone: for angels, apostles, prophets, and all believers, are "fellow-servants," or brethren; and Christ is the Lord of all. (Note, Matt. 23:8—10.)

V. 10—21.

Soon will our Saviour and Judge come to determine our eternal state: but how dreadful will it be to the impenitent and polluted sinner, to be consigned to eternal unrighteousness and filthiness; and to be left "without, among dogs and sorcerers, whoremongers, murderers, idolaters, and all liars!" Oh, may we be found "righteous and holy," and be confirmed in his holy favor and service, as our eternal and unchangeable felicity, when he shall "come, and his reward with him, to render to every man as his work shall be!" Never let us think, that a dead or disobedient faith will save us; when the "Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last," has declared them alone "blessed, who do his commandments," and thus prove their 'right to the Tree of life, and to enter in by the gates into the holy city." These things he has abundantly testified by his messengers to the churches: and by diligently attending to them, we may hope to have him dwell in our hearts, as "the bright and morning-Star," ushering in the eternal day. But if sinners be alarmed, and begin to desire his salvation, let them remember, "that the Spirit and the bride say come;" and all that hear should say to every one of their relations, friends, and neighbors, "Come;" yea, "whosoever will, let him come and take of the water of life freely." Nay, we should all endeavor, as much as possible, to cause the gracious invitation to sound through every land, and to every human being.—Ought not then the ministers and professors of the gospel, to beware of adding any thing, as a restriction on these large and open invitations, or of deducting any thing from them, or of altering in any way the terms of a sinner's acceptance and salvation? God alone is the Judge of men's motives and intentions; but we should keep at the greatest distance from the brink of that tremendous precipice, which is here pointed out to "every man who heareth the words of this prophecy;" and down which multitudes, in every age, rush headlong into destruction. The Lord deliver us from this condemnation! And may the writer, and all the readers, of these observations, have a well-grounded confidence in Christ, and be of that number, who love and long for his appearing, saying, "Amen, even so come, Lord Jesus."—The God of all mercy and grace, be pleased to pardon all that is erroneous and faulty in this publication: and to his holy name be all the praise of whatever is true and profitable! Thanks be to God for having given the writer health, strength, and ability to revise, and bring to a conclusion, another Edition of so large a work. May numbers have as much cause to be thankful for benefit derived from the perusal of it, as he has for the advantage which he has found in writing it: that so, Glory 'may be to the Father, and to the 'Son, and to the Holy Ghost: as it was in the 'beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world 'without end.'—And, "may the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with us all, now, and for ever. Amen."

THE intention of this retrospect, is merely to collect, and to place before the reader in one view, the outline of the interpretation of the book, which has (not without many interruptions of the subject,) been adopted in this publication. The introductory chapters do not seem to require any retrospect: the prophetic part, properly so called, begins with the opening of the seals, in the sixth chapter; which, containing six of the seven seals, has been interpreted to predict, first the progress of the gospel during the period intended; and then the gradual undermining of the Pagan persecuting Roman empire, by several successive judgments, till it was terminated by the conversion of the emperors to Christianity. The seventh chapter has been explained, as predicting, in the former part of it, the enlargement of the church, in consequence of the revolution above mentioned; and in the latter part of it, as describing the blessedness enjoyed with Christ in heaven by the martyrs, and suffering Christians, who had lived during the pagan persecutions.

In the eighth chapter, under the seventh seal, the sounding of seven trumpets is announced, all of which fall under this last seal: but the sounding of four only is here mentioned; with an awful denunciation of "woe on the inhabitants of the earth," when the other three trumpets should be sounded, which, from this circumstance, are generally called, 'The three woe-trumpets.' The four trumpets, the sounding of which is mentioned in this chapter, are interpreted to predict, the gradual subversion of the Roman empire, after it became professedly Christian, but was continually more and more corrupted with superstition and idolatry, and stained with persecution, by the Goths, Huns, Moors, and Vandals; till the whole fabric seemed completely demolished, by the death of the last feeble and obscure emperor, called Momillus, or, contemptuously, Augustulus.

The sounding of the fifth and sixth trumpets, or the two first woe-trumpets, in the ninth chapter, with the events recorded under each, is interpreted to predict the Mohammedan imposture, and its most destructive success; especially in the east, first under the Saracens, headed by Mohammed and his successors; and then, under the Othmans, or Turks, the effects of which remain to this present day.

The tenth chapter is considered as a vision introductory to the opening of "a little book," a kind of appendix, or codicil, to the book with the seven seals; attended by some other inti-

The eleventh chapter, which (exclusive of the concluding verses, relating to the sounding of the seventh trumpet,) is here supposed to be this little book, or appendix, is interpreted to predict the state of the church in the western regions, during the term of the fifth and sixth trumpets, while Mohammedism made such tremendous ravages in the east, or during the period of the twelve hundred and sixty years. This prediction shows the extremely corrupt state of the nominal Christian church; which yet is supplied, during the whole term, with a competent number of suffering witnesses for the truth, who protest against these corruptions; till at length they are slain, their testimony is silenced, and their enemies triumph: but only for a very short time, after which the witnesses arise, ascend into heaven, and tremendous judgments on their enemies make way for the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and the final and universal triumph of the Redeemer's cause, or are connected with those events. The latter circumstances are in this work considered as future; though many eminent expositors are of another opinion, respecting the slaying and rising again of the witnesses, and the sounding of the seventh trumpet.

The concluding verse of the eleventh chapter is here considered as introducing the prophecy of the twelfth chapter, in which the apostle is supposed to resume his subject from the close of the sixth or seventh chapter; or the revolution, by which the Roman empire became professedly Christian, under Constantine the Great; in order to give a more detailed prediction of those events, especially relating to the western world, which had before been very compendiously intimated.—Satan, by his agents and vicegerents, the Pagan persecuting emperors, having in vain endeavored to prevent this revolution; and being, with all their coadjutors, cast out, degraded from authority, and deprived of power to do mischief, in the way which they had formerly done, have recourse, with great zeal, to other measures. And the Devil, having failed of success as a roaring lion, appears as a dragon, a deceiver, yet a destroyer. The church, however, and her seed, before the new projects are ripe, has a place provided in the wilderness, to which she flees at the appointed time, and is secured during the period of twelve hundred and sixty years; which is repeatedly mentioned both by the apostle, and the prophet Daniel.

The thirteenth chapter is interpreted to predict the rise, establishment, and dominion of the papal persecuting Roman empire, as the ten horned beast; of the Popish Clergy, as the two horned beast; and of the Pope, as the image of the beast: with the mark and number of the beast; and the persecutions and cruelties which would be perpetrated by this antichristian power.

The fourteenth chapter is interpreted, as predicting the opposition made by the remnant of true believers, to this antichristian power; and their protest against its abominations, under the name of "Babylon the Great;" and the several stages of that reformation, which at length was effected in the protestant and reformed churches; with a general intimation of those tremendous judgments, by which at last the whole papal persecuting empire will be destroyed, under the image of a harvest and a vintage.—The fifteenth chapter contains a vision of seven angels, having "seven vials, containing the seven last plagues," which were about to be poured out, and in which the wrath of God would be fulfilled.—The pouring out of all these vials is here supposed to take place, under the seventh trumpet; as all the seven trumpets fall under the seventh seal.

The sixteenth chapter records the pouring out of the seven vials, which is interpreted to predict the succession of judgments, by which the papal persecuting empire and church, and Rome itself, the metropolis and centre of both, will be utterly desolated. The whole, or by far the greatest part of this prophecy, however, is here considered as yet unfulfilled; though some interpret the pouring out of the three first vials, to predict the late events on the continent.—The seventeenth chapter gives a figurative, but most intelligible description of the beasts, both the ten horned beast, and the two horned beast, with the extent and seat of their empire.—The eighteenth is interpreted, by all protestant expositors, as a prophecy of the utter desolation of Rome, for all her abominations; with the terror, distress, and ruin of all her adherents, and the exulting joy of the true church of Christ.—In the nineteenth chapter, after a still more animated description of the joy and praise of all the servants of God, on account of these events, and the glorious and blessed effects which will follow, is a prophecy of the subsequent efforts against true Christianity, made by the remains of the antichristian party, under the conduct of "the beast, and the false prophet," or "the two horned beast;" and of the final victory obtained over them, ending in their entire destruction, and the casting of "the beast and the false prophet into the lake of fire burning with brimstone."

Still, however, Satan himself, the grand deceiver of all nations, remains at liberty; and ready to make further efforts against the cause of Christ: but, the twentieth chapter opens with a prediction of his being bound, and cast into the bottomless pit for a thousand years. Then the Millennium, or triumphant reign of Christ, for a thousand years takes place; at the close of which, Satan, being again liberated, successfully renews his efforts; and impels those whom he has deceived and drawn into apostacy from God, to levy war, with tremendous force and violence, against the remnant of believers. But at that crisis, fire from heaven consumes the assailants, the devil is finally consigned to the place of torment; the general judgment immediately succeeds; and, all the wicked being cast into the lake of fire, the state of the righteous in heaven is described in the two concluding chapters, with many coincident instructions and exhortations.

This is the scheme of interpretation adopted in this publication; and it is, at least, the result of much study and reflection on the subject.—One thing further remains to be noticed. Some modern expositors, especially Mr. Faber, suppose another persecuting power to arise towards the end of the twelve hundred and sixty years, distinct from the ten horned and the two horned beasts; which is properly to be considered as ANTICHRIST, as an infidel king, an atheistical, and not popish domination.—The author, when he read this, purposed to give an opinion on the subject, in his exposition of Revelation; but he really found no convenient place, in the body of the work, for introducing it. For, though by no means decided against the sentiment, or averse to it, nay, allowing that modern events may seem to countenance the supposition, he could find no such third power distinctly mentioned, or even hinted at, by St. John. So that proceeding to the close of the book, without finding a proper opening for the subject; he saw no better way, than to mention this circumstance at the close of it.—In respect to the word ANTICHRIST, and the character of Antichrist, he must refer the reader to the notes on the first epistle of St. John. (Notes, 1 John 2:18—25. 4:1—3.)

Money, in Value.

This is a subject of a very difficult nature: for money is mere relative property; and its value consists in the quantity of things useful to life, which it will purchase. Now it is certain, that the same weight, either of brass, silver, or gold, will at one time, and in one place, purchase far more of these things, than in another time and place: and probably, an ounce of silver, in any of the times of which the scripture treats, would purchase as much as three, or four, or five ounces now would. All, therefore, that can be attempted on this head, is to show the relative value of the money mentioned in scripture, as computed in the money of this age and nation (England). An ounce of silver is generally, I believe, coined into something more than five shillings: but as minute exactness is not the object in this place, the computation will be made at that price.

A Table of Time.

Learned men state the names of the months, and their relation to the months into which we divide the year, as follows; but all the names mentioned are not found in scripture. Of those which are, a reference to some text, in which it is named, will be annexed.

1 Nisan, (Neh. 2:1.) or Abib (Ex. 13:4) . . . . .	March, April.
2 Zif, (1 Kings, 6:1.) or Jyar . . . . .	April, May.

5 Ab . . . . .	July, August.

9 Cisleu, or Chisleu, (Neh. 1:1.) . . . . .	{ November, December.
10 Tabeth, (Esth. 2:16.) . . . . .	{ December, January.
11 Shebor, or Sebat, (Zech. 1:7.) . . . . .	{ January, February.
12 Adar, (Ezra, 6:15.) . . . . .	{ February, March.
13 Ve-adar, or the second Adar.

This last month was added, or intercalated, from time to time; when the twelve lunar months, falling considerably short of a solar year, introduced such an irregularity in the seasons, as was inconsistent with the observance of the sacred festivals at the proper time. This month being, on those occasions, added, between the end of Adar, the twelfth month, and the beginning of Nisan, the first month, brought back the computation of the year to some degree of regularity. It answered the purpose, in some measure, which the 29th of February every fourth year, does in our days: viz. to preserve a coincidence between the twelve months, which constitute the year, and the actual yearly revolution of the earth round the sun. But the intercalated month by no means settled the calculations of the Israelites in that degree of exactness, to which astronomers have at present reduced it. The months of Israel as here stated, are supposed to answer, each to the closing half of the former, and the first part of the latter of our months, as annexed to them; but these intercalatory months, and especially the absolute necessity which there was for them, must considerably deduct from accuracy in all these calculations. They are, however, sufficiently exact for all useful purposes.

TABLES OF MEASURES, &c.

The days of the week were numbered by the Israelites in their order, the first, the second, &c. the seventh, or last day of the week, being the sabbath; but it does not appear that they had any names affixed to them.

Their days were generally reckoned, from the setting of the sun, to the next setting of the sun, according to the original arrangement; "The evening and the morning were the first day."

Both the night, from sun-set to sun-rise, and the day, from sun-rise to sun-set, were divided into twelve hours; which must have been unequal in their length, at different seasons of the year. It should, however, be remembered, that the land of promise, being situated much nearer the Equator, the difference in the length of the days in summer and winter, and of the nights during winter, in proportion to the days, was far less, than in this country.—Some, however, think, with much probability, that the division of time into hours, was introduced by the Romans. The word hour, as used in some places of the Old Testament, does not seem to denote a measure of time; but merely the coincidence of events.

The night likewise, from sun-set to sun-rise, was, among the Israelites, divided into four watches.—Supposing the sun to set at six o'clock, according to our computation; the first watch reached from 6 to 9; the second, from 9 to 12; the third, from 12 to 3; and the fourth, from 3 to 6, or sun-rising.

A TABLE OF SOME OF THE STATES, OFFICES, AND DESCRIPTIONS OF MEN, AS MENTIONED IN THE CANONICAL SCRIPTURES.

PATRIARCHS; fathers and heads of families, who eventually become renowned and celebrated in Israel: as the twelve sons of Jacob; and David the ancestor of the kings of Judah.

JUDGES. In the common use of the word, magistrates in general are intended, whether superior or inferior: but it frequently marks out those temporary supreme rulers, whom God raised up, to reform religion and deliver his people, before he placed kings in hereditary succession over them; that is, from the death of Joshua, to the nomination of Saul to be king, or rather of David, as substituted in Saul's place.

ELDERS. This word is used with great latitude in scripture: but it more especially denotes the seventy persons constituting the council, or sanhedrim of Israel; and after the establishment of Christianity, the stated pastors and teachers of the Christian church.

KINGS. The kings, of David's race, were especially appointed to that office, in hereditary succession, by God himself; but for Solomon's sin, ten tribes were taken from his family, and given to Jeroboam.—Thus, the kings of Judah, of David's race, and the kings of Israel, or the ten tribes of several families, reigned separately, till the days of Hezekiah; when Israel, or the kingdom of the ten tribes, was finally carried captive.

ISRAELITES. This is the proper name of the whole nation, as descended from Jacob, or Israel; and became appropriate to the ten tribes only, after their revolt from David's family.

JEWS, OR JUDEANS. The descendants of Judah, with the Levites, Benjamites, and others, who joined themselves to Judah, after the division of the kingdom, are meant by this name.—It is therefore manifestly improper, though very common among learned men, to call the nation in general Jews, at any period of their history, till about the time of the Babylonish captivity; when the ten tribes being dispersed, all the remains of the nation gradually received this name, and are known by it to this day.

A HEBREW OF THE HEBREWS. A lineal descendant from Heber and Abraham; and not one who had been proselyted, or whose ancestors had been proselyted.

A PROSELYTE. A person, from another nation, who was incorporated into the church of Israel, by receiving circumcision, and becoming obedient to the law of Moses. Learned men distinguish between different kinds of proselytes; but the scripture does not.

HIGH PRIEST. The priest of Aaron's race, who was allowed and required to enter into the most holy place, was constituted chief ruler of the church of Israel, and was the special type of Christ.

SECOND PRIEST. He, as it is generally supposed, who was appointed to officiate for the high priest, in case he was disqualified.

CHIEF PRIESTS. The Heads, or principal persons, of the twenty-four orders, into which the sons of Aaron were divided by David, that they might serve in rotation.

LEVITES. The descendants of Levi, by Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, who were not of Aaron's race; but, in many respects, servants to the priests, yet often teachers and magistrates in Israel.

NETHINIM. Servants to the priests and Levites, for the meaner and more laborious offices; being the descendants of the Gibeonites and of others who were voluntarily devoted to these services.

PROPHETS, OR SEERS. Extraordinary ministers of religion, whom God raised up to reveal his will to mankind, to reform Israel, and to predict future events; especially the coming of the Messiah, his sufferings, and the glory that should follow.

SONS OF THE PROPHETS. Persons educated in the schools of the prophets, from the days of Samuel, who instituted them; from whom God frequently called men to the prophetic office; and who on many occasions, were extraordinary teachers of true religion, when the priests and Levites neglected their duty.

SCRIBES. Learned men, whose professed object was to expound and enforce the law of God, from the days of Ezra to those of our Lord.—The word scribe in the history of Israel, under regal government, generally means secretary; that is, to the king.

RABBIES, DOCTORS, LAWYERS. Scribes, who had attained to certain degrees of eminence or reputation in their profession; and who were distinguished in a manner, not wholly unlike the academical honors conferred by modern universities.

TIRSHATHA. The governor of the Jews, appointed by the Persian kings, after the captivity.

TETRARCHS. Persons, each of whom were appointed by the Roman emperors, to govern a fourth part of that district, which had formed the kingdom of Herod the great; and which, at his death, was divided into four governments. (Note, Luke, 3:1.)

CENTURIONS. Officers in the Roman army commanding a hundred men.

PUBLICANS. Tax-gatherers, under the Romans. The principal publicans farmed large districts, at an annual rent; and were aided by the Roman armies, in exacting their demands from individuals; and the inferior publicans rented smaller tracts of them, or were their servants.

PHARISEES. A sect among the Jews, in the days of Christ, (having sprung up some time before,) which, under the profession of extraordinary strictness and sanctity, was remarkable for hypocrisy, pride, censoriousness, and covetousness. They however maintained the true doctrine concerning the resurrection, and received all the books of the Old Testament, as divinely inspired, even as "the oracles of God."

SADDUCEES. A sect of infidels among the Jews, who, professing indeed some regard to certain parts of the scriptures, denied the resurrection, disbelieved a future state, and the existence of angels and spirits.

HERODIANS. Sadducees, who shaped their religion to outward circumstances, and especially paid court to Herod. Some say, they professed to believe that King Herod was the Messiah.

SAMARITANS. The descendants of the nations, whom the kings of Assyria settled in the country, from which they dispossessed the ten tribes; united with some Israelites, and apostate Jews, and Jewish priests, who established a schismatical religion in Samaria, which produced the most determined reciprocal enmity and antipathy between them and the Jews.

NAZARENES. A name by which the Christians were at first distinguished; but afterwards applied to an heretical sect.

STOICS. A sect of heathen philosophers, who prided themselves in apathy, or an affected indifference to pleasure or pain; who considered virtue as its own reward; and who maintained that all events were determined by fate, as superior to the will of the Gods, even of the supreme God.

EPICUREANS. A sect of heathen philosophers, who ascribed all things to chance, and considered pleasure as the chief good.

APOSTLES. Persons, selected by Jesus Christ, to be the witnesses of his life and death, and especially of his resurrection, to mankind; the repositories of his holy doctrine, from whom it should be communicated to the nations, and to all future ages; and who, by their preaching and writing, should make known his holy religion; so that to the end of the world, their doctrine must be appealed to, as the standard of truth and duty.

EVANGELISTS. For many ages, this word has marked out the writers of the four narratives, which have been transmitted to us, as of divine authority, concerning the miracles, life, death, and resurrection of our blessed Saviour: but in the New Testament, it signifies simply preachers of the gospel; yet with a special designation of certain persons, who, under the authority and direction of the apostles, (the principal missionaries of Christ to mankind,) were sent forth to establish and regulate the churches planted by the apostles, and to plant new churches. They seem to have been distinguished from stated pastors, in nearly the same manner as modern missionaries are from resident ministers.

BISHOPS. The same persons are in many places called both bishops and elders; but it is generally and with great probability supposed, that after a time, the bishops became the superintendents and overseers, not only of the churches, but of the pastors also, each in a limited district.

DEACONS. Persons appointed, by the counsel and direction of the apostles, to take care of the poor, and the secular concerns of the churches; from whom, however, it seems evident, that elders and evangelists were frequently chosen, and sent forth.

NICOLAITANS. A corrupt company of heretics, answering in many respects to the Antinomians of modern times. There is however no proof, that they were the disciples of Nicolas, one of the first deacons; indeed the supposition is in the highest degree improbable.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE LIVES, SUFFERINGS, AND MARTYRDOM
APOSTLES AND EVANGELISTS.

I. ST. STEPHEN, the Proto, or first martyr, was elected, with six others, as a deacon, out of the Lord's seventy disciples. Stephen was an able and successful preacher. The principal persons belonging to five Jewish synagogues entered into many altercations with him; but he, by the soundness of his doctrine, and strength of his arguments, overcame them all, which so much irritated them, that they suborned false witnesses to accuse him of blaspheming God and Moses. Being carried before the council, he made a noble defence, but that so much exasperated his judges, that they resolved to condemn him. At this instant Stephen saw a vision from heaven of Jesus, in his glorified state, sitting at the right hand of God. This vision so greatly rejoiced him, that he exclaimed in raptures, "Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God." They then condemned him, and having dragged him out of the city, stoned him to death. On the spot where he was martyred, Eudocia, the empress of the emperor Theodosius, erected a superb church.

The death of Stephen was succeeded by a severe persecution in Jerusalem, in which 2000 Christians, with Nicar the deacon, were martyred; and many others obliged to leave the place.

II. ST. JAMES THE GREAT, a Galilean, was the son of Zebedee, a fisherman, the elder brother of St. John, and a relation to Christ himself; for his mother Salome was cousin-german to the virgin Mary. Being one day with his father fishing in the sea of Galilee, he, and his brother John, were called by our Saviour to become his disciples. They cheerfully obeyed the mandate, and leaving their father, followed Jesus. It is to be observed, that Christ placed a greater confidence in them, than in any other of the apostles, Peter excepted.

Christ called these brothers Boanerges, or the sons of thunder, on account of their fiery spirits, and impetuous tempers.

Herod Agrippa, being made governor of Judea by the emperor Caligula, raised a persecution against the Christians, and particularly singled out James as an object of revenge.

James, being condemned to death, showed such an intrepidity of spirit, and constancy of mind, that his very accuser was struck with admiration, and became a convert to Christianity. This transition so enraged the people in power, that they condemned him likewise to death; when James the apostle, and his penitent accuser were both beheaded on the same day, and with the same sword. These events took place in the year of Christ 44.

Much about the same period, Timon and Parmenas, two of the seven deacons, suffered martyrdom; the former at Corinth, and the latter at Philippi, in Macedonia.

III. ST. PHILIP. This apostle and martyr was born at Bethsaida, in Galilee, and was the first called by the name of Disciple. He was honored with several important commissions by Christ, and being deputed to preach in Upper Asia, labored very diligently in his apostleship. He then travelled into Phrygia, and arriving at Heliopolis, was greatly grieved to find the inhabitants so sunk in idolatry, as to worship a large serpent. St. Philip, however, converted many of them to Christianity, and even procured the death of the serpent. This so enraged the magistrates, that they committed him to prison, had him severely scourged, and afterwards crucified. His friend, St. Bartholomew, found an opportunity of taking down the body and burying it; for which, however, he was very near suffering the same fate. His martyrdom happened eight years after that of St. James the great, A. D. 52.

IV. ST. MATTHEW. This evangelist, apostle, and martyr, was born at Nazareth in Galilee, but resided chiefly at Capernaum, on account of his business, which was that of a toll-gatherer, to collect tribute of such as had occasion to pass the sea of Galilee. On being called as a disciple, he immediately complied, and left every thing to follow Christ. After the ascension of his master, he continued preaching the gospel in Judea about nine years. Designing to leave Judea, in order to go and preach among the Gentiles, he wrote his gospel in Hebrew, for the use of the Jewish converts; but it was afterwards translated into Greek by St. James the less. Going to Ethiopia he ordained preachers, settled churches, and made many converts. He then proceeded to Parthia, where he had the same success; but returning to Ethiopia, he was slain by a halbert in the city of Nadabar, about the year of Christ 60. He was remarkably inoffensive in his conduct, and temperate in his mode of living.

V. ST. MARK. This evangelist and martyr was born of Jewish parents, of the tribe of Levi. It is imagined, that he was converted to Christianity by St. Peter, whom he served as an amanuensis, and whom he attended in all his travels. Being entreated by the converts at Rome to commit to writing the admirable discourses they had heard from St. Peter and himself: this request he complied with, and composed his gospel accordingly, in the Greek language. He then went to Egypt, and constituted a bishopric at Alexandria: afterwards he proceeded to Lybia, where he made many converts. Returning to Alexandria, some of the Egyptians, exasperated at his success, determined on his death. To accomplish this they tied his feet, dragged him through the streets, left him to remain, bruised as he was, in a dungeon all night, and the next day hurried his body. This happened on the 25th of

AN ACCOUNT OF THE LIVES, SUFFERINGS, AND MARTYRDOM

April. His bones were carefully gathered up by the Christians, decently interred, and afterwards removed to Venice, where he is considered as the tutelar saint, and patron of the state.

VI. ST. JAMES THE LESS. This apostle and martyr was called so to distinguish him from St. James the great. He was the son, by a first wife, of Joseph, the reputed father of Christ: he was, after the Lord's ascension, elected bishop of Jerusalem: he wrote his general epistle to all Christians, and converts whatever, to suppress a dangerous error then propagating, viz. "That a faith in Christ was alone sufficient for salvation, without good works." The Jews being, at this time, greatly enraged that St. Paul had escaped their fury, by appealing to Rome, determined to wreak their vengeance on James, who was now 94 years of age: they accordingly threw him down, beat, bruised, and stoned him; and then dashed out his brains with a club, such as was used by fullers in dressing cloths.

VII. ST. MATTHIAS. This apostle and martyr was called to the apostleship after the death of Christ, to supply the vacant place of Judas, who had betrayed his master, and was likewise one of the seventy disciples. He was martyred at Jerusalem, being first stoned, and then beheaded.

VIII. ST. ANDREW. This apostle and martyr was brother to St. Peter, and preached the gospel to many Asiatic nations. Arriving at Edessa, the governor of the country, named Egeas, threatened him very hard for preaching against the idols there worshipped. St. Andrew persisting in the propagation of his doctrines, he was ordered to be crucified on a cross, two ends of which were transversely fixed in the ground. He boldly told his accusers, that he would not have preached the glory of the cross, had he feared to die on it. And again, when they came to crucify him, he said, that he coveted the cross, and longed to embrace it. He was fastened to the cross, not with nails but cords, that his death might be more lingering. In this situation he continued two days, preaching the greatest part of the time to the people; and expired on the 30th of November.

IX. ST. PETER. This great apostle and martyr was born at Bethsaida in Galilee, being the son of Jonah, a fisherman, which employment St. Peter himself followed. He was persuaded by his brother to turn Christian, when Christ gave him the name of Cephas, implying in the Syriac language, a rock. He was called, at the same time as his brother, to be an apostle; gave uncommon proofs of his zeal for the service of Christ, and always appeared as the principal speaker among the apostles. He had, however, the weakness to deny his master, after his apprehension, though he defended him at the time; but the sincerity of his repentance made an atonement for the atrociousness of his crime.

The Jews, after the death of Christ, still continued to persecute the Christians, and even went so far as to order several of the apostles, among whom was Peter, to be scourged. This punishment they bore with great fortitude, and rejoiced that they were thought worthy to suffer for the sake of Christ.

Herod Agrippa having caused St. James the great to be put to death, and finding that it pleased the Jews, resolved, in order to ingratiate himself farther with the people, that Peter should fall a sacrifice to their malice. He was accordingly apprehended, and thrown into prison; but an angel of the Lord released him, which so enraged Herod, that he ordered the centinels, who guarded the dungeon in which he had been confined, to be put to death. St. Peter, after various other miracles, retired to Rome, where he defeated all the artifices, and confounded the magic of Simon, the magician, a great favorite of the emperor Nero: he likewise converted to Christianity one of the concubines of that monarch, which so exasperated the tyrant, that he ordained both St. Peter and St. Paul to be apprehended. During the time of their confinement, they converted two of the captains of the guard, and forty-seven other persons to Christianity. Having been nine months in prison, Peter was brought out from thence for execution, when, after being severely scourged, he was crucified with his head downwards; which position, however, was at his own request. He, as well as Paul, suffered on the 29th day of June. His body being taken down, embalmed, and buried in the vatican, a church was afterwards erected on the spot; but this being destroyed by the emperor Heliogabalus, the body was removed, till the 20th bishop of Rome, called Cornelius, conveyed it again to the vatican: afterwards Constantine the great erected one of the most stately churches in the universe over the place. Before we quit this article it is requisite to observe, that previous to the death of St. Peter, his wife suffered martyrdom for the faith of Christ, and was exhorted, when going to be put to death, to remember the Lord Jesus.

X. ST. PAUL, the apostle and martyr, was a Jew of the tribe of Benjamin, born at Tarsus, in Cilicia. He was at first a great enemy to, and persecutor of the Christians; but after his miraculous conversion he became a strenuous preacher of Christ's gospel. At Iconium, St. Paul and St. Barnabas were near being stoned to death by the enraged Jews; wherefore they fled to Lycaonia. At Lystra, St. Paul was stoned, dragged out of the city, and left for dead. He, however, happily revived, and escaped to Derbe. At Philippi, Paul and Silas were imprisoned and whipped; and both were again persecuted at Thessalonica. Being afterwards taken at Jerusalem, he was sent to Cesarea, but appealed to Cesar at Rome. Here he continued a prisoner at large for two years. Being released, he visited the churches of Rome, and preached in France and Spain. Returning to Rome, he was again apprehended, and, by the order of Nero, martyred, by being beheaded.

XI. ST. JUDE, the apostle and martyr, the brother of James, was commonly called Thaddeus. Being sent to Edessa, he wrought many miracles, and made many converts, which stirring up the resentment of people in power, he was crucified, A. D. 72.

XII. ST. BARTHOLOMEW preached in several countries, performed many miracles, and healed various diseases. He translated St. Matthew's gospel into the Indian language, and propagated it in that country: but at length, the idolaters growing impatient with his doctrines, severely beat, crucified, and flayed him, and then cut off his head.

XIII. ST. THOMAS, as he was called in Syriac, but Didymus in Greek, was an apostle and martyr. He preached in Parthia and India, where displeasing the Pagan priests, he was martyred by being thrust through with a spear.

XIV. ST. LUKE, the evangelist and martyr, was the author of a most excellent gospel. He travelled with St. Paul to Rome, and preached to divers barbarous nations, till the priests in Greece hanged him on an olive-tree.

XV. ST. SIMON, the apostle and martyr, was distinguished by the name of Zelotes, from his zeal. He preached with great success in Mauritania, and other parts of Africa, and even in Britain, where, though he made many converts, he was crucified by the then barbarous inhabitants of that island, A. D. 74.

XVI. ST. JOHN. This saint was, at once, a prophet, apostle, divine, evangelist, and martyr. He is called the beloved disciple, and was brother to James the great. He was previously a disciple of John the Baptist, and afterwards not only one of the twelve apostles, but one of the three to whom Christ communicated the most secret passages of his life. The churches in Asia founded by St. John were, Smyrna, Pergamos, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea, and Thyatira, to whom he directs his book of Revelations. Being at Ephesus, he was ordered by the emperor Domitian to be sent bound to Rome, where he was condemned to be cast into a caldron of boiling oil. But here a miracle appeared in his favor; the oil did him no injury, and Domitian therefore not being able to put him to death, banished him to Patmos to work at the mines. He was, however, recalled by Nerva, who succeeded Domitian after his decease, but was deemed a martyr on account of his having undergone the mode of an execution, though it did not take effect. He wrote his epistles, gospel, and revelations; all in a different style; but they are all equally admired. He was the only apostle who escaped a violent death: lived the longest of any of them, being near 100 years of age at the time of his death.

XVII. ST. BARNABAS was a native of Cyprus, but of Jewish parents: the time of his death is uncertain, but supposed to be about the year of Christ 73.

26, 27:	Methuselah dies, aged 969	1656	2348	Josh. 14:7:	Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, is born	2474	1530
6:7:	The Deluge	1656	2348	Ex. 3: &c.	God appears to Moses, in a burning bush, and sends him to deliver Israel	2513	1491
	Thus Adam lived till Lamech, the father of Noah, was 96 years of age; Noah was 595 years of age, when Lamech died; and Shem was above 90 at the same time. For it is not clear, which of Noah's sons was the first-born.			4:—39:	All the events recorded in the chapters, referred to in the margin, occurred in the same year, except as a change in the beginning of the year, [Ex. 12:1.] made the difference of some months	2513	1491
From the Deluge to the calling of Abram.
8:9:	Noah, after the deluge, leaves the ark	1657	2347	40: Lev. 1:—27:	The tabernacle is set up, the giving of the law is completed, and preparations made for Israel's immediately marching to possess Canaan; but because of their unbelief and rebellion, they are doomed to continue in the wilderness till 40 years are passed	2514	1490

Josh. 11:	The conquest of Canaan is completed	2558	1446		gives Israel occasion of desiring a king; and Saul, whom God had selected and commanded Samuel to anoint, having delivered Jabesh-Gilead in extreme distress, it is acknowledged as king	2928	1075
13—17:	Joshua, at God's command, begins to divide the land by lot	2559	1445		God having rejected Saul, for disobedience, sends Samuel to Bethlehem to anoint David as the king of Israel	2937	1067
18—22:	The tabernacle is set up at Shiloh, the rest of the land is divided; and the Reubenites, &c. are dismissed to their possessions eastward of Jordan	2560	1444	1 Sam. 13:—16:	David conquers and slays Goliath	2941	1063
23:	Joshua, now drawing near to the end of his course, assembles the elders and principal persons, and exhorts them to obedience, with earnest encouragements and warnings	2577	1427	17:	Saul, having long persecuted David, and committed many atrocious crimes, perishes miserably; and David is anointed and acknowledged king, by the men of Judah	2948	1056
24:	Having again assembled them, and engaged them to covenant with God, in a most solemn manner; he dies, aged 110	2578	1426	18—31: 2 Sam. 1: 2:1—4.	N. B. Every one, who has, in the least degree, turned his thoughts to the subject, will perceive, that this division of the years, from the death of Joshua, to the accession of David, is materially different from that of the most of learned chronologers. It is not, therefore, here inserted, in opposition to them; but because the author, feeling dissatisfied with their arrangement, which must be allowed to be very perplexed; endeavored to lay together the outlines of another plan, in which these years may be arranged. He is very far indeed from being satisfied with his own plan; but he is of opinion, that it may possibly suggest a hint to some other person, engaged in these enquiries, which may eventually lead to some more satisfactory statement, than he has yet seen. It is generally agreed, that Samson and Eli, and Ithzan, Elon and Abdon, were, in some part of the time allotted to each of them, contemporaries; judging Israel, in different districts of the land; and it does not seem improbable, that Elon and Abdon should continue unmolested, at a distance from the Philistines, even during part of the years which intervened between the death of Eli, and the great reformation under Samuel.
Judg. 19:—21:	The Levite's concubine is abused and killed by the men of Gibeah; in consequence of which the other tribes make war against the Benjamites, almost to the destruction of the whole tribe	2594	1410	2 Sam. 1:2:3—5:5.	After many conflicts David is anointed king over all Israel	2956	1048

Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, of Israel, confederate against Ahaz, to dethrone him, to set aside the family of David, and to appoint a king over Judah of another race: but God, by Isaiah, assures Ahaz that this design shall not succeed, because Immanuel, the Son of a virgin, should yet spring from the stock of David	3265	741
1 Kings 22:50.	Jehoshaphat dies, and is succeeded by his son Jehoram, or Joram, [who had reigned four years along with his father.] in the fifth year of Jehoram, or Joram, of Israel	3115	889	Is. 7:1-9.
2 Kings 8:16-18.	Jehoram, of Judah, having murdered his brethren, and reigned in a very wicked manner, being instigated by his wife Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, dies miserably; according to a

2 Chr. 28:1-8.	Nevertheless, for the wickedness of Ahar and Judah, God gives Pekah a great victory, in which 120,000 men of Judah were slain	3264 740 3265 739	2 Kings 23:31-35. 2 Chr. 36:2-4.	After three months Pharaoh-necho carries Jehoahaz captive into Egypt; and makes Jehoikim, Josiah's eldest son, king over Judah
2 Kings 15:30, 31.	Pekah, of Israel, is murdered by Hoshea			During the reign of Jehoikim, Jeremiah continues to prophesy; and Urijah also prophesies, who is slain by Jehoikim. [ Jer. 26:23.] Probably Habakkuk prophesied at the same time.
15:29. 1 Chr. 5:26.	In the days of Pekah, probably towards the close of his reign, Tiglath-pilezer, king of Assyria, carried captive the inhabitants of the western and northern regions of the land.			Nebuchadnezzar is associated with Nabopolassar his father, king of Babylon, in the kingdom
2 Kings 16:10-16.	Ahar seeks help from Tiglath-pilezer, king of Assyria, who adds to his distresses; and Ahar acts more and more impiously.	3268 736	2 Kings 24:1. 2 Chr. 36:6,7.	Nebuchadnezzar makes war on Jehoikim, and renders him tributary. At this time Daniel and his friends were led captive; and many of the sacred vessels of the temple were carried to Babylon; and from this year the principal computation of the seventy years' captivity begins
17:3.	Shalmaneser, of Assyria, invades Israel, and renders Hoshea tributary to him	3276 728
16:20. 18:1-6.	Ahar dies, and is succeeded in Judah, by his son Hezekiah; who immediately exerts himself to destroy idolatry, and to re-establish the worship of Jehovah; and celebrates a most remarkable passover, inviting the Israelites to join in it	3278 726	2 Kings 24:1. Dan. 2.	Jehoikim revolts from Nebuchadnezzar. In the same year Daniel reveals and interprets Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the image, as predicting the four great monarchies, the Chaldean, Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Roman; and the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, which destroyed and dissipated the image; denoting the kingdom of Christ, and its final universal prevalence. In consequence, Daniel and his friends are greatly preferred
2 Kings 17:4,5. 18:9.	Hoshea, of Israel, relying on the king of Egypt, refuses to pay tribute to Shalmaneser, and is taken captive; and Shalmaneser lays siege to Samaria	3279 725
17:6-41. 18:10-12.	Samaria is taken by Shalmaneser; and the ten tribes, for their sins, are carried captive, and dispersed in distant countries; and their land is peopled by colonies of other nations, from whom, and from some Israelites incorporated with them, sprang the Samaritans	3283 721	Dan. 5:31.	Cambyzes, called also Darius the Median, is born
18:13-16.	Sennacherib, king of Assyria, invades Judah, but, appeased by a tribute, recedes	3291 713	2 Kings 24:2-6. 2 Chr. 36:2. Jer. 22:18,19. 36:30.	Jehoikim is slain, and succeeded by his son Jehoiachin, or Jechoniah, or Jecozias, or Coniah
30: 2 Chr. 32: 24. Is. 38:	About the same time Hezekiah is sick, nigh to death; but he is restored by miracle; and deliverance from the Assyrians is promised to him			In the same year Cyrus the Persian, is born
2 Kings 20:12-20. Is. 39:	Hezekiah, having offended, in his conduct towards the ambassadors of the king of Babylon the Babylonish captivity is predicted	3292 712	2 Kings 24:8-16. 2 Chr. 36:3,10. Jer. 24:1.	Jeremiaiah, with a great number of the Jews, is carried captive to Babylon; and Zedekiah, his uncle, the youngest son of Josiah, is made king in his stead
2 Kings 18:17-37. 19: 2 Chr. 32:1-23. Is. 37: 37:	Sennacherib again invades Judah; takes many cities; prepares to besiege Jerusalem; and sends menacing and blasphemous messages and letters to Hezekiah; but in answer to the prayers of Hezekiah and Isaiah, and the remnant of pious Jews, his army is cut off by an angel; and soon after he is murdered at Nineveh, in the temple of his idol, by his own sons	3294 710	Jer. 25:1. Ez. 1:1.	This may be considered as another date of the 70 years' captivity. Ezekiel, who was at this time carried captive, dates the years of the captivity from it.
2 Kings 20:20. 21: 2 Chr. 32:33. 33:1.	Hezekiah dies, and is succeeded by his son Manasseh, aged only 12 years	3306 698	2 Kings 24:20. 2 Chr. 36:13. Jer. 52:3. Ez. 17:12-20. 21: 22-27.	Ezekiel is called to the prophetic office. Zedekiah, rebelling against Nebuchadnezzar, to whom he had sworn fidelity, confederates with Pharaoh-hophra, king of Egypt
2 Kings 21:2. &c. 2 Chr. 33:2 -11.	Manasseh reigns most wickedly, beyond all who preceded him; till he is carried captive to Babylon	3328 676 3344 660	Ez. 24:2. Jer. 39:1. 52:4. Ez. 24:2. Jer. 37:4-11.	Nebuchadnezzar lays siege to Jerusalem
33:12-20.	Or rather perhaps about . . . . . Having deeply repented, and being restored to his kingdom; he supports the worship of God, till his death, having reigned in all 52 years	3361 643	20. 2 Chr. 36: 17-21. Jer. 39: 52:	He drives back Pharaoh-hophra, who comes to help Zedekiah. Nebuchadnezzar takes Jerusalem; utterly destroys it, with the temple; slays Zedekiah's sons before his eyes, puts out his eyes, and carries him captive to Babylon
2 Kings 21:19-26. 22:1. 2 Chr. 33:21-25. 34: 1.	His son Amon, who succeeds him, aged 22 years, persisting in wickedness, is slain (after reigning two years), by his servants, and is succeeded by his son Josiah, being only 8 years old	3363 641 3374 630		Nebuchadnezzar requires all his officers, &c. to worship a golden image, which he had set up; but Shadrach, Mesbek, and Abednego, magnanimously refuse: they are cast into the fiery furnace, and are miraculously preserved
Jer. 1:2.	Josiah begins to reform Judah and Israel. Jeremiah enters on his prophetic office, being then a young man	3375 629	52:30. Dan. 3.	Nebuzardan carries captive the scattered remnant of the Jews
2 Kings 22:3-20. 2 Chr. 34:8 -22.	Josiah gives orders for repairing the temple: when Hilkiah, the high priest, finding the book of the law, in the most holy place, brings it to Josiah, and reads it to him; by which he, being greatly alarmed, sends to Huldah the prophetess, who denounces the desolations of Jerusalem and Judah; but not in Josiah's time	3381 623	Ez. 29:17-20.	Nebuchadnezzar takes Tyre, after a siege of 13 years; and the spoil of Egypt, which he next invaded, is promised to him as his wages
2 Kings 23:1-20. 2 Chr. 34: 23-34.	In the same year he proceeds with and completes his reformation; and fulfils the predictions delivered concerning him, above 300 years before, [ 1 Kings 13:2-32.]		Dan. 4:1-27.	Being rendered insolent by prosperity, he is warned by a dream of a dire calamity, which was coming upon him; which dream Daniel interprets
2 Kings 23:21-24. 2 Chr. 35: 1-19.	He celebrates the passover, with extraordinary zeal and solemnity	3382 622	28-32.	The dream is fulfilled in his most extraordinary insanity
Nah. 1:3.	Nineveh is taken and desolated by the Medes and Chaldeans, according to the predictions of Nahum	3392 612	33-37.	At the end of seven years, he recovers his senses, is restored to the authority, and adores and honors the God of heaven
2 Kings 23:23, 29. 2 Chr. 35: 20-27. 36:2.	Josiah, being 37 years of age, and having reigned 31 years, is slain in battle against Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt; and greatly lamented by Judah and by Jeremiah. —The people of the land make Jehoahaz, Josiah's second son, king in his stead.—Zephaniah prophesied during the reign of Josiah, [ Zeph. 1:1.]	3394 610	2 Kings 25:27-30. Jer. 52:31-34.	He dies, and is succeeded by Evil-merodach, who releases Jehoachin, in the 37th year of his captivity, and treats him with kindness

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE.

		A.M.	B.C.			A.M.	B.C.
	Evil-merodach is slain, and succeeded by Neriglissar, his brother-in-law	3446	538		Xerxes destroys the celebrated temple of Bel, at Babylon; which further tends to the decay of that city	3526	478
	In the same year, Cyrus, the Persian, joins Cyaxares, the Mede, against Babylon, being about 41 years of age				After an inglorious reign, especially in an unsuccessful war, with immense forces, against the Greeks, which so weakened his kingdom, as to prepare the way for its subversion, Xerxes is slain, by the treachery of Artabanus	3539	465
Dan. 7:	Cyrus, as commander of the Medes and Persians, slays in battle Neriglissar, and soon after his successor, Laborosarchad Belshazzar, the son of Evil-merodach, succeeds to the throne of Babylon; and in the same year Daniel has his vision of the four beasts; as emblematic of the four great empires, subverted and succeeded by the kingdom of Christ, according to Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the image, &c. [Dan. 2:]	3448	556		Artaxerxes, the youngest son of Xerxes, having been led, by the calumnies of Artabanus, to slay his eldest brother Darius, ascends the throne; though he had another elder brother (Hystaspis) at a distance; and to secure himself slays Artabanus	3540	461
8:	Daniel has the vision of the ram and the he-goat, &c. as emblematic of the Medo-Persian empire, subverted by Alexander the Great, and the Grecian empire, under his successors, and many subsequent events	3449	555	Esth. 1:1.	This Ahasuerus is supposed to be the Ahasuerus, mentioned in Esther.
	Cyrus, having conquered a great part of Asia, besieges Belshazzar in Babylon	3451	553	1:	Being fully established in the throne, he makes a great feast for his nobles; and divorces Vashti, his queen, for disobeying his orders	3542	462
8:	While Belshazzar celebrates a licentious feast; and blasphemes the God of heaven, by profaning the sacred vessels in honor of his idols; a hand-writing on the wall terrifies him, which Daniel interprets to denounce his imminent ruin, and the subversion of his kingdom by the Medes and Persians; and in that night Cyrus takes Babylon, slays Belshazzar, and transfers the kingdom to Cyaxares his uncle, called in scripture, Darius the Mede.—Thus the Medo-Persian empire is established; being the breast and arms of silver, in Nebuchadnezzar's image; and the bear in Daniel's vision. [Dan. 2: 7:]	3463	541	2:	Esther, the Jewess, pleases the king, and is made queen instead of Vashti	3546	458
	Darius, being greatly preferred by Darius, is envied and hated by his nobles; and by their artful devices is cast into the den of lions; whence he is miraculously delivered	3466	538	Ezra 7:	Ezra the priest, a learned scribe, obtains a commission from Artaxerxes, to go as governor to Jerusalem, to reform and settle the state of the nation.—From this decree, the date of Daniel's 70 weeks is supposed to begin. [Dan. 9: 24—27.]	3547	457
9:	About this time he had the vision of the seventy weeks.	3467	537	Esth. 2:21—23.	About the same time, Mordecai discovers the treason of Bigtha and Teresh
2 Chr. 36: 22, 23.	Darius dies, and is succeeded by Cyrus, who, in the same year, proclaims liberty to the captive Jews; permits and encourages them to rebuild the temple and city; and restores the sacred vessels. In consequence of this proclamation, a remnant of Jews go to Jerusalem, being assisted by their brethren and by others.—This terminates the seventy years' captivity, from the third of Jehoiaquin, when Daniel was carried captive to Babylon	3468	536	Ezra 8:—10.	Ezra, arriving at Jerusalem, with priests, Levites, and a large company, and a considerable treasure, separates the Jews from their heathen wives, which they had married contrary to the law of Moses	3548	456
Ezra 1: 1. 5: 15—15. 7: 6. Is. 45: 1—6.	The remnant of Jews, having arrived at Jerusalem, set up an altar, begin to observe their solemn feasts, and prepare to rebuild the temple	3469	535	Esth. 3:	After this he continued in authority during several years, of which there is no history extant
Ezra 2: 1—7.	They lay the foundation of the temple, with mingled tears and acclamations of praise	3470	534	4:—10:	Mordecai, refusing to bow in adoration to Haman, the Agagite; Haman, in revenge, plots the destruction of all the Jews throughout the whole kingdom of Persia	3550	454
Dan. 10:—12:	About this time Daniel had his last vision.	3471	533		And obtains from Ahasuerus a decree for that purpose	3551	453
Ezra 4: 7—24.	The Samaritans write to him against the Jews rebuilding the temple, and obtain a decree forbidding them to proceed	3472	532	Neh. 1:—4:	This project is defeated by means of Esther, and ends in the destruction of Haman and his family, and of the enemies of the Jews; in Mordecai's advancement to the highest authority under the king, and in the great prosperity of the Jews; in remembrance of which, the feast of Purim is instituted, which is observed by the Jews to this day	3552	452
Ezra 5: 1, 2. 6. 14. Hag. 1: 2. Zech. 3: 4:	Zerubbabel and Jeshua, excited by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, set forward the building of the temple	3473	531	5:—11:	Nehemiah is sent governor to Jerusalem, with extensive powers, and a commission to build the walls of the city, which he immediately attempts, and effects notwithstanding great opposition	3559	445
Ezra 5: 2—17.	The Samaritans, and their associates, again attempt to hinder the work, but are made to desist by a decree of Darius.—About this time Haggai prophesies, that the glory of this temple shall exceed that of the former temple	3474	530	13: 6.	He proceeds prosperously to execute his commission; to repeople Jerusalem; and to reform both the civil and ecclesiastical state of the nation	3560	444
	The Babylonians, having revolted from Darius, are reduced, and the high walls of Babylon are demolished	3475	529		He goes to the Persian court	3571	433
6: 14—22:	The temple is finished and dedicated	3476	528		But returning, as it is supposed, with a renewed commission, he finds that many corruptions had crept in during his absence; and proceeds zealously to enforce reformation; in effecting which he banished the grandson of Eliashib, the high priest, who had married the daughter of Sanballat, the Heronite; who in consequence excited Sanballat and the Samaritans to build a temple on mount Gerizim, in opposition to that at Jerusalem; which augmented and perpetuated the enmity between the Jews and the Samaritans	3572	432
	Darius Hystaspis, after a prosperous reign, dies, and is succeeded by his son Xerxes	3477	517		Some, however, place this last act of Nehemiah much later.—In the time of Nehemiah, it is recorded, that Ezra prepared and set forth a correct edition of the scriptures, as extant at that time. Being himself an inspired writer, he no doubt did this under a special superintendency of the Holy Spirit; and it is evident, that our Lord and his apostles sanctioned the sacred volume, which was edited at this time, as "the oracles of God;" with no other variation, as far as it can now be found, than the insertion of the book of Malachi, after the prophecy of Malachi, after Ezra's decease. Some think that Malachi prophesied towards the end of the time, during which Nehemiah was governor; others think that he was raised up, soon after his removal.

Plato the celebrated philosopher is born	3576	428	ros, near Alexandria, one of the wonders of the world, is finished by Ptolemy Soter	3720	284
Artaxerxes dies, and, after some bloody contests, Darius Nothus succeeds to the throne of Persia	3581	423	In the same year Ptolemy Soter dies, and is succeeded by his son, Ptolemy Philadelphus
Malachi delivers his prophecy	3584	420	Seleucus, king of Syria, is slain, and succeeded by his son, Antiochus Soter	3725	279
According to some chronologers, Nebemiah banishes the grandson of Eliashib, the high priest, &c.	3595	409	A multitude of emigrated Gauls, after many defeats and disasters, pass over out of Greece into Asia Minor; and there obtain a settlement, in the country afterwards called Galatia	3727	277
Here the Old Testament closes, and there is no further scriptural information, till the time of Zecharias and Elizabeth, the parents of John the Baptist, the forerunner of the Saviour.			About this time, the Hebrew scriptures began to be translated into Greek; for the benefit of the dispersed Jews, who spake that language; which opened the way for learned heathens to become acquainted with them
From the close of the Old Testament to the coming of Christ.			Antiochus Soter, of Syria, dies, and is succeeded by his son, Antiochus Theus	3748	261
Darius Nothus dies, and is succeeded by Artaxerxes Mnemon	3599	405	Manasseh, the high priest, who had succeeded Simon the just, dies; and is succeeded by Onias, the son of Simon	3753	251
Aristotle the philosopher is born	3620	384	Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, dies, and is succeeded by his son Ptolemy Euergetes	3757	247
Johanan, high priest of the Jews, kills his brother Joshua in the temple, for which the nation is fined by the Persians	3638	366	Antiochus Theus, king of Syria, is poisoned by his wife Laodice, and succeeded by his son Seleucus Ceraunus	3758	246
Artaxerxes Mnemon dies	3645	359	Seleucus Callinicus is vanquished, and taken prisoner by the Parthians	3774	230
Alexander the Great is born in Macedonia	3643	356	Who is poisoned by his attendants	3781	223
Plato the philosopher dies, aged 80. He is supposed to have seen and studied the Hebrew scriptures; and to have taken many things from them	3656	348	And is succeeded by his brother Antiochus, afterwards surnamed the great
Ochus, king of Persia, is murdered, and succeeded by Arogus	3666	338	Ptolemy Euergetes, king of Egypt, dies, and is succeeded by his son Ptolemy Philopater	3783	221
Arogus is murdered, and succeeded by Darius Codonannus, the last king of the Medo-Persian empire	3668	336	Who, having obtained a great victory over Antiochus king of Syria, obtains possession of Judea; and coming to Jerusalem, attempts to enter the holy of holies, in the temple; but is opposed by the high priest, and retires with horror of mind, but with implacable hatred of the Jews	3787	217
In the same year, Philip, king of Macedonia, is murdered; and his son, Alexander the Great succeeds him in the throne			Having made peace with Antiochus, he attempts to destroy all the Jews at Alexandria; but fails of his purpose	3788	216
Alexander the Great is appointed general of the Greeks against the Persians	3659	335	Ptolemy Philopater, king of Egypt, dies, and is succeeded by his son, Ptolemy Epiphanes, being only five years of age	3800	204
He passes over into Asia, and gains a victory over Darius at Granicus	3670	334	Antiochus of Syria, combining with Philip of Macedonia, to divide Ptolemy Epiphanes's dominions between them; the Egyptians crave the assistance of the Romans for their infant king, who take him under their protection	3802	202
He reduces all Asia Minor, and gains another great victory over Darius, at Issus	3671	333	This seems to have been the first entrance of the Romans, (the fourth kingdom, in Daniel's prophecies,) into the dominion of the Macedonian, or Grecian empire, which was the third kingdom.
He takes Tyre and Gaza, and visits Jerusalem peaceably, [ See Dan. 8:5—7. ]	3672	332	The Romans send M. Emilius Lepidus into Egypt, to protect Ptolemy	3803	201
With inexpressible celerity, he passes the Euphrates and the Tigris, and obtains a decisive victory over Darius, at Arbela	3673	331	Simon, the high priest, dies, and is succeeded by his son, Onias III.	3809	195
Soon after, Darius is slain; and the Medo-Persian empire is terminated, and succeeded by the Grecian, or Macedonian; as denoted by the belly and thighs of brass, in Nebuchadnezzar's dream; [ See Dan. 2:32—39. ] the leopard in Daniel's first vision, [ See Dan. 7:6. ] and the he-goat in his second, [ See Dan. 8:5—8. ]			Antiochus the Great passes over into Europe, to join Philip, king of Macedonia, against the Romans	3812	192
Alexander the Great dies at Babylon; whose vast dominions and conquests, after many dreadful conflicts between his captains, form four kingdoms, Macedonia, Thrace, Syria, and Egypt	3681	323	He is driven back with disgrace into Asia, by the Romans	3813	191
Ptolemy, afterwards called Soter, gains possession of Jerusalem, and carries a great number of Jews into Egypt, where they form a colony at Alexandria	3684	320	Lucius Scipio, the Roman consul, follows him, and by a complete victory, compels him to make peace, on most ignominious and ruinous conditions.—Thus the fourth kingdom, in Daniel's prophecies, gradually subverts the third. [ See Dan. 2:33—40. 7:7—19.]	3814	190
This year, Jaddus, the high priest, dies, [ See Neh. 12:22. ] and is succeeded by Onias			Antiochus the Great is slain, and succeeded by his son, Seleucus Philopater	3816	186
Onias dies, and is succeeded by Simon the just	3704	300	Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, is slain, and succeeded by his son, Ptolemy Philometer, aged only six years	3824	180
About the same time Seleucus builds Antioch in Syria, [ See Acts 9:19—26. 13:1.]			Seleucus Philopater dies, and is succeeded by his brother, Antiochus Epiphanes	3829	176
Epicurus begins to teach his profane philosophy	3694	310	Jason buys of him the high priesthood, and supplants his brother Onias	3829	175
The dominions of Alexander are formed into four kingdoms: Egypt, under Ptolemy Soter; Macedonia, under Cassander, Thrace, under Lysimachus; and Syria, with all the east, under Seleucus	3703	301	Jason introduces idolatrous observances into the worship at the temple	3830	174
Thus Daniel's visions were exactly fulfilled. [ See Note, Dan. 7:6. 8:8.]—The Jews, however, had little concern, except with the kingdoms of Egypt and Syria; between which their country was situated. At this time they formed a part of Ptolemy's dominion			Menelaus, Jason's brother, supplants him, by buying the high priesthood of Antiochus	3832	172
Seleucus, king of Syria, builds Seleucia, on the Tigris, which tended greatly to depopulate Babylon	3711	293	Onias, the elder brother of Jason and Menelaus, is put to death at Antioch
Simon the just dies, and is succeeded in the high priesthood, by his brother Eleazar	3718	291

Antiochus Epiphanes begins to persecute the Jews; putting a stop to the daily sacrifice, and the worship at the temple; and building a fortress on mount Arca, to curb the inhabitants of Jerusalem	3836	168	The Romans greatly extend their conquests, both in Asia and Africa, and reduce many regions into the form of provinces	3928	76
But Mattathias and his sons, take arms against him	3837	167	Herod the Great is born	3932	72
The Romans, having conquered Persus, the king of Macedonia, terminate the kingdom	3838	166	Alexandra dies. Hyrcanus seizes the kingdom: but is soon deprived of it by Aristobulus, his younger brother	3934	70
Seven brethren, and their mother after them, are most cruelly martyred, because they refused to commit idolatry, or violate the law of Moses, at the command of Antiochus; and the persecution is carried on with great vehemence	3839	165	Pompey the Great, an eminent Roman commander, after many conquests, reduces Syria into the form of a province: thus terminating the Macedonian or Grecian kingdom, and establishing that of the Romans, the fourth great monarchy in Daniel's prophecies	3939	65
Mattathias being dead, his son Judas succeeds him in command, and obtains most signal victories over the lieutenants of Antiochus Epiphanes.	3840	164	Pompey, appealed to by Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, and promising to arbitrate between them, discovers that Aristobulus is preparing for war; and in consequence marches against Jerusalem, and takes it, after a siege of three months, and restores Hyrcanus.—At this time he enters into the temple, and into the holy of holies, and many have remarked, that he never after prospered in any undertaking. From this period, the Jews became dependent on the Romans; after having been, for a long time, independent, by reason of the weakness of the Syrian and Egyptian kings.—In the same year Augustus Cæsar is born	3941	63
Judas vanquishes Lysias, Antiochus's deputy, recovers Jerusalem, and restores the daily sacrifice, and the worship at the temple	3841	163	Aristobulus, and Alexander his son, raise disturbances in Judea, but are vanquished by Gabinius, a Roman commander	3947	57
Antiochus Epiphanes dies, and is succeeded by his son, Antiochus Eupator	3842	162	Crassus, the Roman general, plunders the temple at Jerusalem	3950	54
Judas, after several other successes against the surrounding enemies of the Jews, vanquishes Lysias a second time; and compels him to terms of peace	3843	161	He is vanquished and slain by the Parthians	3951	53
Menelaus, the usurping high priest, is slain, and succeeded by Alcimus	3844	160	Julius Cæsar prevails against Pompey, at Pharsalia: Pompey flees to Egypt, and is there treacherously murdered	3956	48
Demetrius, the son of Seleucus Philopater, slays Antiochus Eupator, and succeeds to the throne of Syria	3845	159	Antipater, an Edomite, by the favor of Cæsar, whom he had assisted in Egypt, is placed ruler over Judea, nominally under Hyrcanus, but in fact as superseding him. He constitutes his son Herod governor of Galilee	3957	47
Nicanor, sent by Demetrius against the Jews, is slain with all his army. Barchides, sent to avenge this blow, slays Judas, and grievously oppresses the Jews.—Judas is succeeded by his brother, Jonathan	3846	158	Julius Cæsar at this time being made perpetual dictator, the empire of the Cæsars commences.	3960	44
Alcimus, the high priest, dies, and Barchides leaving Jerusalem, the Jews enjoy peace	3851	153	Antipater, by permission from the Romans, rebuilds the walls of Jerusalem	3961	43
Barchides, returning into Judea, is routed by Jonathan, and Simon his brother; and makes peace with the Jews	3854	150	Julius Cæsar is assassinated in the senate	3962	42
Jonathan, the brother of Judas Maccabeus, is made high priest, by Alexander Balas, who claimed the kingdom of Syria against Demetrius: and whom Jonathan greatly assisted	3855	149	Antipater is poisoned: but his sons, Phasaël and Herod, revenge his death by that of the murderer	3963	41
From this period, the high priesthood continued in the Asmodean, or Maccabean family, till the time of Herod the Great.	3861	143	Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, excites disturbances in Judea: but is vanquished by Herod	3968	36
Demetrius is vanquished and slain by Alexander Balas, who succeeds him	3862	142	The Parthians, having obtained many advantages against the Romans, slay Phasaël, make Hyrcanus prisoner, and appoint Antigonus king of Judea: but Herod, fleeing to Rome, is there constituted king by the ruling party	3969	35
Onias, the son of Onias, who had been high priest, builds a temple in Egypt, like that at Jerusalem	3863	141	Herod besieges Jerusalem	3970	34
Jonathan, after various successes, in support of the son of Alexander Balas, against his competitor Demetrius, the son of him who was slain by Alexander Balas, is treacherously murdered by Tryphon: and is succeeded in the high priesthood by his brother, Simon, who, declaring for Demetrius, is made also sovereign ruler of Judea	3869	135	After many losses, and successes, he takes the city, and is established in the Royal authority, being by birth an Edomite, and a Jew only as proselyted	3973	31
He takes the fortress, which Antiochus Epiphanes had erected to curb Jerusalem, demolishes it, and levels the hill on which it stood	3874	130	Herod makes Ananias, an obscure person, high priest instead of Antigonus, which occasions disturbances	3974	30
The sovereignty of Judea is confirmed to Simon, and to his posterity, by the unanimous consent of the Jews, in a general assembly at Jerusalem: and he gives them from all tribute to any foreign prince, and effects, in many things, a reformation among them	3875	129	Deposing him, he appoints Aristobulus, brother of Mariamne his wife to the high priesthood. The succession belonged to him, but he was no more than 17 years of age. Herod not long after murdered him	3975	29
Simon is murdered, with two of his sons, by Ptolemy his son-in-law; and is succeeded by his son John, surnamed Hyrcanus	3876	128	Being in danger of a capital punishment for this murder, he appeases Mark Anthony, or rather Cleopatra, his infamous paramour, with large presents	3976	28
John Hyrcanus asserts his independency against the Syrians; and destroys the temple on mount Gerizim	3877	127	At the instance of Mark Anthony, he attacks and subdues Malchus, king of Arabia Petrea	3978	26
He conquers the Idumæans, or Edomites, and compelling them to be circumcised, incorporates them among the Jews. From this time the name of Idumæans is scarcely mentioned in history	3879	125	Augustus, (afterwards Augustus Cæsar,) having vanquished Mark Anthony, Herod with much difficulty makes his peace with him	3979	25
Aristobulus and Antigonus, sons of John Hyrcanus, lay siege to Samaria	3894	110	Herod, in a furious rage and jealousy, puts to death Mariamne, his beloved wife, who was descended from the Maccabees	3980	24
Antiochus Cyrenicus, at that time king of Syria, (that kingdom being entangled by perpetual conflicts with the Ptolemies, kings of Egypt, by incessant internal contests and revolutions, and by the overwhelming power of the Romans,) in vain attempts to relieve Samaria, which falls into the hands of Hyrcanus, with all Galilee	3896	108	And, the next year, Alexandra, her mother	3981	23
Hyrcanus, hitherto supported by the sect of the Pharisees, recently formed among the Jews; forsakes them, and joins the Sadducees, their opponents	3897	107	To conciliate the Romans, he occasionally conforms to heathen observances, which greatly disgust the Jews	3982	22
He dies, and is succeeded by Aristobulus, his eldest son, who first took the insignia and name of king	3898	106	He rebuilds Samaria and calls it Sebaste, from the Greek word Sebastes, or august; which was the title given to the Roman Emperor, or assumed by him	3985	19
Aristobulus, having conquered Iturea, and killed his brother Antigonus, dies, and is succeeded by Alexander Jannæus, his brother	3909	95	In the same year, he takes great care to relieve the Jews, under the pressure of a grievous famine, which conciliated their minds toward him	3986	18
Pompey and Cicero, celebrated Romans, are born in the same year	3910	94	Augustus Cæsar acquires absolute dominion over the whole Roman Empire	3987	17
Alexander Jannæus, after various transactions, some successful and others unsuccessful, is opposed by a mutiny of the Jews at the temple, during the feast of tabernacles, of whom he slays 800 men	3931	73	In the same year, Herod completes for himself a stately palace on Mount Zion	3991	10
He subdues the inhabitants of Gilead and the Moabites, having ill success, in a war against Obodas, an Arabian king, the Jews make war against him. This war continued six years	3936	68	He builds Herodium	3992	6
Alexander Jannæus dies, after many successes and cruelties, and is succeeded in the regal authority by his wife Alexandra, who, conciliating the Pharisees, reigns peaceably to the end of her life	3937	67	He begins to build Cæsarea, which was not finished till the end of 12 years	3993	5
She makes her eldest son, Hyrcanus, high priest	3938	66	Being more and more favored by Augustus, he prepares to rebuild, or thoroughly to repair and beautify, the temple	4000	0
The Pharisees, managing the affairs of Alexandra, grievously	3939	65	After two years' preparation, he enters on the work
	3940	64	Having finished Cæsarea, [before called Stratons tower,] he names it in honor of his patron Cæsar Augustus
	3941	63	He puts to death the two sons, whom he had by Mariamne, on a frivolous accusation of treason
	3942	62	In this year, the angel Gabriel promised to Zacharias a son, by his wife Elizabeth, whom he must call John
	3943	61	The same angel shows the Virgin Mary, that the Messiah should be born of her
	3944	60	The census, or register of estates and families throughout Judea, was made at this time: but the taxes were not imposed or collected till some years after. [Note, Luke 2:2.]
	3945	59	Christ is born at Bethlehem
	3946	58	In the same year, Herod in vain attempts to murder the infant Saviour, but cruelly massacred the male children near Bethlehem. He puts his son Antipater to death, on an accusation of treason and parricide, and five days after

dies himself in the most dreadful manner			Claudius makes Herod Agrippa king of Judea, in addition to his former territories	4046	42
Archelaus succeeds Herod his father, in Judea, Idumæa, and Samaria; Herod Antipas in Galilee and Pætræa; and Philip, in Auranitis, Trachonitis, Paneas, and Balinæa.—Joseph and Mary, with the child Jesus, returning out of Egypt, settle at Nazareth in Galilee	4002	2	Herod puts James the brother of John to death, and purposes to kill Peter also, who is miraculously preserved: and soon after Herod, smitten by an angel, is eaten with worms, and dies	4048	44
The Christian Era begins, 4 years after the real time at which our Lord was born	4004		Claudius dies, and is succeeded by Nero	4058	54
Archelaus, the son of Herod, having been convicted of mal-administration in his government, is deposed, and banished into Gaul: and Judea is made a province of the Roman empire, by Quirinius, or Cyrenius, governor of Syria, who first levied the taxes, according to the census, or register, before made; and Coponius is placed over it. Thus the sceptre was departing from Judah, for Shiloh was come, though not manifested	4012	8	Felix is appointed governor of Judea, about He is superseded by Festus Nero, the Roman emperor, dies, and is succeeded by Galba; Who, in the same year, is murdered, and succeeded by Otho Otho murders himself, and is succeeded by Vitellius, Who is speedily cut off, and succeeded by Vespasian;	4059 4067 4075	55 63 69
In this year, Jesus went up to Jerusalem, and at the temple sat in the midst of the teachers of the law, both hearing them and asking them questions			In the beginning of whose reign Jerusalem is taken by the Romans, under Titus, the son of Vespasian, and all the awful predictions of our Lord, as well as those of the ancient prophets, are exactly accomplished.—The city is desolated; the temple destroyed, so that not one stone was left on another; 1100,000 persons perished miserably in the siege; and the remnant of the Jews are scattered into all nations, and dispersed among them.
Marcus Ambivius succeeds Coponius, as procurator of Judea. Tiberius is admitted to share the authority with Augustus, whence his 15 years is dated. [Luke 3:1.]	4014	10	Vespasian dies, and is succeeded by his son Titus	4083	79
Annius Rufus succeeds Marcus Ambivius	4016	12	Titus dies, and is succeeded by Domitian, his brother	4085	81
Augustus Cæsar dies, and is succeeded by Tiberius, his adopted son;	4017	13	Domitian is slain, and succeeded by Nerva	4100	96
Who appoints Valerius Gratus, procurator of Judea	4018	14	Nerva dies, and is succeeded by Trajan	4102	98
Valerius Gratus removes Annas, the high priest, and substitutes Ismael, the son of Fabus	4019	15	Trajan dies, and is succeeded by Adrian	4121	117
Eleazar, the son of Annas, is made high priest instead of Ismael	4027	23	N. B.—This carries on the chronology of the Roman emperors considerably beyond the termination of the New Testament; and therefore it is here closed.—It may be observed by the reader, that the author has not attempted to arrange into a table, either the date of our Lord's discourses and miracles, &c., or the history contained in the Acts of the apostles. In fact, he is not competent to add any thing to what has been already advanced in the notes: a table of these particulars must have assumed an appearance of certainty , or at least satisfaction , as to the date of the several events, which he does not possess: those to whom such matters appear important, will find this already done by many writers, according to their several computations, with sufficient exactness: and after all, to the generality of readers, the precise time when this or that sermon was preached, or miracle wrought, or epistle written, is not a matter of very great consequence. At least, the author, probably for want of a proper turn of mind, or ability, must be permitted to devolve this service on others; as incapable of performing it to his own satisfaction.
Simon, the son of Caiaphas, is made high priest, in the place of Eleazar	4028	24
Joseph, surnamed Caiaphas, the son of Annas, is made high priest, instead of Simon	4029	25
Pontius Pilate is made procurator of Judea; and in the same year John begins his ministry	4030	26
Not long after, our Lord is baptized by John, and after his temptation in the wilderness, begins to exercise his public ministry, being 30 years of age. [Luke 3:23. John 1:29—51.]	4031	27
Christ is crucified, under Pontius Pilate, when Tiberius was the Roman emperor	4037	33
Tiberius dies, and is succeeded by Caligula	4041	37
Caligula makes Herod Agrippa, grandson of king Herod by his son Aristobulus, and nephew to Herod Antipas, who beheaded John the Baptist, and brother to Herodias, and father to king Agrippa, tetrarch, or king, of Galilee	4042	38
